PLATE IV.

46. TZAR I VEL. KN. PHEODORE IVANNOVITCH, B. F. [Vse Roffskiye], born in 1557, fucceeded his father in 1584; died in 1598, aged forty-one.

His wife was Irene, daughter of Feodor Godunof. She retired to a convent under the name of Alexandra.

His only child was a daughter, named Phedofia, who died in early infancy.

This dynafty occupied the throne during a period of 643 years, and produced a feries of 46 fovereigns; which gives for each reign only a mean duration of thirteen years eleven months and fome days. As it was long the cuftom for brothers to fucceed in prejudice to their nephews, the fovereigns were not young when they came to the crown; and fome of them only just appear on the throne, from which they are prefently after expelled.

It is likewife obfervable that extremely few of thefe princes attain to an advanced age.

RUSSIA.

TROUBLES and confusions, engendered by the difcontents and ambition of the great, and fomented by rancorous competitors for the throne, had torn the vitals of the ruffian monarchy, at the conclusion of the fixteenth and the beginning of the feventeenth centuries, and at the fame time raifed up against it two powerful adversaries, the kings of Sweden and Poland, who difguifed their real views under a contest for the throne. How little reliance could be made upon the Poles, or their fidelity as friends and allies, had been fufficiently evinced by repeated experience; and there was the greatest probability that the fame difasters would enfue from engaging in an intimate alliance with Sweden. It feemed to admit of no doubt that the election of a polifh VOL. II. В

a polifh or a fwedifh prince would neither be for the happiness of the Ruffians nor the quiet of their empire; and therefore no alternative was left but for the whole to concur in placing a native Ruffian on the throne, to difown all attachment to foreign candidates, to unite cordially together, and in one general union, with a trueborn patriot at their head, to fecure themfelves from a difinemberment or violent poffession with which the empire was threatened by the Swedes and Poles. The longing for a tranquil and stable government, after fo many storms, was so great, that deputies from all parts of the empire appeared at Mofco for giving their votes at the election of a tzar. It was the general with that the throne might be filled by a Ruffian; but the gratification of it was involved in many difficulties, and might again open a wide field for difcontents, and jealoufies, and cabals. The very election which was defigned to provide against a renewal of the late diffurbances and confusions, might have a contrary effect, by ftrewing the feeds of fresh turbulence and confusion. The dangers into which the nation had lately been plunged, of being ruined by inteffine broils and fubjugated by foreign enemies, had called up the patriotifm of a numerous party of Ruffians, and afforded them an opportunity of performing important important fervice to their country both in the council and in the field. Thefe perfons therefore now might prefer their claims on the national gratitude, and afpire to the crown, or even firive for it, and, by various methods, as Schuifkoy had formerly done, extort it from their countrymen in proof of their fenfe of obligation. Yet it was to be feared that the election of any one of thefe patriots might be felt as an affront to the reft, who had been equally ferviceable to the flate, and, by inciting their jealoufy, create divisions, and fo reduce the country again to the brink of deftruction. Accordingly the electors wavered long in irrefolution and doubt.

In the meantime a party was imperceptibly forming among them, whofe with it was to put a youth upon the throne who had hitherto lived remote from the grand theatre of adminifiration and war, and confequently was without adherents, and had neither friends nor foes. MIKHAILA ROMANOF was the name of this youth, a defcendant of the ancient family of the tzars. This relationship indeed was very diftant; but, as there was no nearer progeny, it yielded him fome pretension to the throne of his relations. Besides, his father Philaretes, from his eminent flation as metropolitan of Rostof, and B 2

still more on account of the patriotism he had difplayed during the troubles of the empire, and on account of the many falutary counfels which he had given, was held in very high respect, and had therefore been appointed one of the embaffy that carried to the king of Poland the account of the election of his fon Vladiflaf to be tzar of Ruffia. All the time that Philaretes, with the other ambaffadors, was detained in the king's camp, his wife and their fon Mikhaila lived in perfect retirement and almost unknown, in a convent at Kostroma. Now, that it was propofed to call this Mikhaila to the government, one part of the electors refuled him their votes becaufe he had no knowledge of state affairs. However, the teflimony that was given to his good conduct and excellent intellectual endowments by perfons who knew him, prevailed with a majority fufficient for carrying his election, as the most effectual means of preventing the interference of faction. The clergy was most interefted in this choice. They were particularly defirous that a Ruffian, born and brought up in the orthodox greek communion, fhould be raifed to the throne, as an effectual means of prevent_ ing the poifon of protestant or catholic herefy from being propagated in the ancient, pure, and orthodox church of Ruffia by a fwedifh or polifh polish prince. - Accordingly the voice of an ecclefiaftic at laft gave the decifion in favour of Mikhaila Romanof. " It had been announced " to him," - for fo a metropolitan declared in the hall of election, - " by a divine revelation, " that the young Romanof would prove the " most fortunate and prosperous of all the tzars " that had fat on the throne." - To believe that even the Deity interpofed in the election, and by fo manifelt an indication had pointed out the fittest ruler for them, was much too flattering to the generality of the voters for them not to feel it their duty to obey the fuggestion of heaven; and their reverence for the fuperior clergy, the patriarch, the metropolitans, and bifhops was fo great, that no man would prefume to doubt the veracity of a perfon of that rank, though every unbiaffed individual might eafily perceive that this pretended revelation was either a stratagem of policy or fanaticism, or at the very utmost was perhaps founded on a dream. In the meantime, this revelation being once known, the people at large expressed fo plainly their defire to have the young Romanof for their fovereign, that all were prefently united in their choice. The young man himfelf, however, refused to accept the offered crown. -Indeed what was there in the flate of the emmile i pire, B 3

pire, what in the fates of a Boris or a Schuifkoy to make him defirous of becoming the fucceffor of these men? and it could by no means be taken amifs in Mikhaila's mother, that fhe implored with tears the deputies who were fent to her and her fon, to fpare him the intended honour. But this very refufal confirmed numbers still more in the belief that Mikhaila was the worthieft candidate for the throne, and would prove the happiest tzar. At length the deputies returned to Mofco, bringing with them the confent of the monarch elect; and all men promifed themfelves more calm and peaceable times, when Mikhaila Romanof was crowned and had fworn to obferve the articles that were fubmitted to his affent *.

The two royal neighbours of Poland and Sweden were now therefore fruftrated in the expectations they had formed on the ruffian throne; but the new fovereign found it no eafy tafk to free himfelf from those foreign candidates, especially as they had put themfelves at the head of an armed force, and were not only on the borders of the country, but had already made advances into the empire itself. Moreover, the embers of the ancient feuds were fill finoaking, and feveral parts of the empire were haunted by the partizans of Dmitri. But after Mikhaila's acceffion the government was conducted on a wife and prudent plan. His first efforts were directed to quell entirely the internal ferments; and, by uniting the nation under their new head, to employ the general force against the foreign enemy.

and

Though the fecond Dmitri had been flain, yet Marina did not abandon her purpofe, by the means of her adherents, if not to afcend the throne of Ruffia, yet to fix her fovereignty in fome part of the empire. A boy whom fhe declared to have had by Dmitri, but who probably was fuppofititious, was by her partizans announced to be the future fucceffor of the father; and an adventurer, named Zarufki, an accomplice of Marina, appointed guardian to the pretended fon. But this new artifice of Marina was of fhort duration. The boy, the guardian, and the mother were prefently clapped into prifon and punished for their contrivance. Thus was difperfed the whole party of Dmitri, which, with various degrees of strength at various times, had brought the empire into many troubles. However the fuccels that had attended the first Dmitti had called up yet another fucceffor to B4 him him in Pfcove; but he finished his part very soon at the gallows.

Mikhaila now made it his next concern to rid himfelf of the Poles and Swedes, who were already mafters of those parts of the empire that lay contiguous to their feveral frontiers. Schui-Ikoy had called in the Swedes to his affiftance; and in 1609 they marched a body of five thoufand men to the frontiers, defeated the Poles that were in connection with the fecond Dmitri, delivered Mofco, and might probably have contributed much towards quelling the diffurbances in the empire, if Schuiskoy had punctually paid them the flipulated fubfidies. But, diftrufting one of his relations, the prince of Novgorod, who was fuccefsfully carrying on an underhand negotiation with Sweden, and whom Schuifkoy therefore fufpected of afpiring to the throne by the affiftance of that court, it followed that the fwedish troops were neglected; and, in order to enforce payment, remained in the empire, took poffeffion of the country bordering on Sweden, took Kexholm by famine, and Novgorod by stratagem, and therefore could not be immediately expelled.

The empire was in too weak a condition to cope at once with two fuch enemies as Sweden and and Poland. Accordingly Mikhaila first attempted the gentler mode of negotiation, and made a beginning with Sweden. The Poles were held in the greatest aversion, as having afforded fupport to Dmitri, laid Mofco in afhes, and done exceeding great harm to the empire. Befides, they would never abandon the hope of feeing Vladiflaf on the ruffian throne. For however refolutely the king of Poland had formerly refused * to fend out this prince, he feemed now to be as forward to do fo, on hearing that his fcruples had rendered the whole election fruitlefs, and given occasion to another. The Swedes indeed, after Mikhaila's election, made fome attempts to repulfe the latter: though too late. Mikhaila maintained his ground, and the Swedes thought it most advisable, in 1617, to conclude a treaty of peace, which however was purchafed on the fide of Ruffia by the ceffion of Ingria and Karelia, and was once more obliged to evacuate Efthonia and Livonia. However, one enemy was pacified, and the empire on one fide quieted: within two years a pacification with Poland was also brought to effect. For, when the king of Poland faw that his delays had utterly and irrecoverably ruined the caufe of his fon, and that the nation unanimoufly adhered to the young tzar, of which he had a fufficient proof, when an army with Vladiflaf at its head penetrated into Russia, in order, if possible, to affert the priority of his election against that of Romanof. It being drawn into ambuscades, first on one fide, and then on another, by the ruffian commander, pushed into districts already defolated, where they fuffered much by cold and hunger, a treaty of peace for fourteen years and a half, was concluded in 1619, by which the Ruffians evacuated Smolensk, and feveral other towns with their territories to the Poles. A facrifice to which, however, they agreed only in compliance with the then pofture of affairs, and in the hopes of more fortunate conjunctures, when they might redemand the ceded territories as an expired loan.

The ruffian embaffy that had formerly been deputed to Vladiflaf on his election, now returned from Poland, and with them the tzar's father. The place of patriarch just now falling vacant, the tzar his fon conferred upon him this fupreme fpiritual dignity, whom, as the patriarchs always refided at Mofco, he had therefore continually near him, and profited fo well by the experience and advice of his father, that the latter was generally regarded as co-regent, and fat.

fat, whenever audiences were given, at the right hand of his fon. Foreign minifters brought credentials not only to the tzar, but alfo to his father the patriarch; and it is affirmed by all the writers of those times, that the father's influence was extremely great; and, as Philaretes, in quality of patriarch, often spoke in behalf of peace, it was owing in a great measure to him, that the reign of his fon was so diffinguished for clemency, gentlenes, and acts of benevolence.

As Mikhaila had fhewn himfelf defirous of living in amity with Sweden and Poland, he was not lefs eager to form connections with other european ftates; and accordingly fent ambaffadors to England, Denmark, Holland, and the german emperor. Thus Ruffia, which had hitherto been confidered rather in the light of an afiatic than an european power, became more and more known to the reft of Europe, and rivalfhips now rofe for obtaining treaties and alliances with that empire.

The peace with Poland being only for a flated term of years, could be confidered no otherwife than as a temporary accommodation, (though even what are denominated treaties of everlafting amity fcarcely laft fo long as this flipulated period,) it was to be fuppofed that, on the expiration of that term, hostilities were to be re-commenced. menced. Mikhaila, therefore, juffly thought it advifable to put his frontiers in the best state of defence, and to have his troops placed in fuch a condition by foreign officers, that in cafe the Poles fhould have recourfe to arms at the termination of the truce, he might be able to defend himfelf, or perhaps even to act on the offenfive, and reconquer the countries that had been ceded to the Nay, ere the time agreed on for the ar-Poles. mistice was expired, on the death of Sigifmond, he made fome attempts to recover thefe territories, under the idle pretext that he had concluded a peace with Sigifmond, and not with his fucceffor. But the very ruffian commander, who had valiantly defended Smolensk with a fmall number of troops against the Poles, now lay two whole years indolently with an army of 50,000 men, and provided with good artillery, before that town, and at length retreated on capitulation. A retreat for which he and his friends were brought to answer with their heads. In the meantime the ruffian nation were fo diffatisfied with this campaign, and the king of Sweden, whom Mikhaila wanted to perfuade into an alliance with him against the Poles, shewing fo little inclination to comply, the tzar thought it the wifest course he could purfue, to return to the former amicable relation with Poland. Peace was was therefore again agreed on, and matters remained, as fo frequently happens, after fhedding the blood of thousands of human beings, as they were before. Mikhaila plainly perceived that ruffian troops were able to effect but little against the polifh *.

Mikhaila had, moreover, during his reign, which continued till 1645, employment enough in endeavouring to heal the wounds which the many-headed fpirit of party had inflicted on his country; to compose the diforders that had arisen; to reftore the administration which had been so often disjointed and relaxed; to give new vigour and activity to the laws, disobeyed and inefficient during the general confusions; and to communicate fresh life to expiring commerce. It * Into what different circumflances and relations, quite opposite to the former, may flates and empires fall! At that time the Ruffians could not make head against the Poles: how totally is the cafe altered in our times! At that time it was earnefly infiled on the ruffian fide at the negotiation for peace, that the Poles should deliver up the diploma of election which had been fent to Vladiflaf, for fear that they might at fome future time make use of it to the difadvantage of Ruffia; which the Poles even refused to do, pretending that this diploma was loft. Ruffia has nothing now to apprehend on that fcore, effecially fince all the archives of Poland have been brought from Warfaw to St. Peterfburg.

redounds greatly to his honour that he proceeded, in all these respects, with prudence and moderation, and brought the disorganised machine of government again into play. More than this, the restoration of the old order of things, was not to be expected of him.

To give farther ftability to repofe, to elevate the refpect of the empire, to amend the laws, to make trade and commerce, manufactures and agriculture flourifh, was referved for his fucceffors; and Alexey, his fon, who acceded to the throne on his demife, accomplifhed in various ways the expectations that had been entertained in thefe regards.

However, the administration of a certain Morofof, to whom Mikhaila at his death committed the education of Alexey *, then in his minority, well nigh deftroyed the tranquillity which had fo lately been reftored. Morofof trod in the footfleps of Boris, put himfelf, as that favourite of the tzar had done, into the higheft pofts, and thus acquired the moft extensive authority in the flate, turned out all that flood in his way, distributed offices and dignities, as they fell vacant, among his friends and creatures, and even became, like Boris, a near relation of tzar Alexey, by marrying a fifter of the tzaritza. Like Boris, indeed, Morofof effected much good, particularly by making the army a main object of his concern, by strengthening the frontiers against Poland and Sweden, by erecting manufactories for arms, by taking a number of foreigners into pay for the better difciplining his army, and by diligently exercifing the troops himfelf. But thefe important fervices to the ftate could not render the people blind and infenfible to the numerous acts of injustice and oppression which were practifed with impunity by the party protected by this minion of the tzar. The most flagrant enormities were committed, more particularly in the administration of justice, the most facred of all the duties of government. The fentence of the judge was warped to either fide by prefents; witneffes were to be bought; feveral of the magistrates, however incredible it may feem, kept a number of fcoundrels in readinefs to corroborate or to oppugn for a fum of money, whatever they were required to confirm or to deny. Such profligates were particularly employed, in order to get rich perfons into cuftody on charges of any fpecies of delinquency fworn against them by falle witneffes, to condemn them to death, and then to feize upon their property; as the accumulation.

cumulation of wealth feemed to be the general characteristic of all men in office. From the fame corrupt fountain flowed a multitude of monopolies, and exceffive taxes on the prime neceffaries of life. The confequence of all this was the oppreffion of the people by privileged. extortioners, and murmurs against injustice and the exorbitance of imposts. In addition to this, those grandees who had now the reins of government in their hands, affumed a haughty, austere behaviour towards the fubjects, whereas Mikhaila and his father had been friendly and indulgent, and their gentlenefs communicated itself to all who at that time took part in the administration. From these feveral caufes arofe difcontents in the nation; fuch great men as were neglected and difappointed, contributed what they could to fan these discontents, and to bring them to overt act. Mofco, the feat of the principal magistrate, who, himself in the higheft degree unjust, connived at the iniquities of his fubordinate judges, was the place where the people first applied for redrefs. They began by prefenting petitions for the tzar at court, implored the removal of these diforders, and expofed to him in plain terms the abufes committed by the favourite and his adherents. But thefe petitions were of no avail, as none of the courtiers tiers would venture to put them into the hand of the tzar, for fear of Morofof's long arm. The populace, therefore, once ftopped the tzar, as he was returning from church to his palace, calling aloud for righteous judges. Alexey promifed them to make first inquiry into their grievances, and to inflict impartial punifhment on the guilty ; the people, however, had not patience to wait this tardy process, but proceeded to plunder the houses of fuch of the great as, were most obnoxious to them. At length they were pacified only on condition that the author of their oppressions should be brought to condign punifhment; not however till they had killed the principal magistrate, and forced from the tzar the death of another nefarious judge, could they be induced to fpare the life of Morofof, though the tzar himfelf intreated for him with tears, and vowed an effectual amendment of conduct in his name. Thus was tranquillity reftored in Mofco, and fhortly afterwards in Novgorod and Picove, where likewife difcontents had broke out on account of the exorbitances of the great. At Novgorod on this occasion, the metropolitan Nikon acquired great merit; a man, who, fprung from an inferior station, raifed himfelf by a reputation for extraordinary piety and holinefs to the patriarchal dignity, and was in high favour with tzar Alexey; VOL. but likewife, beguiléd by his good fortune, he interfered too much in ftate affairs, and, in one word, would willingly have played the fame part with Alexey, as the patriarch Philaretes performed with his fon the tzar Mikhaila: a project which at length ejected him from the patriarchate *.

Thefe diffurbances in Mofco, Novgorod, and Pfcove, which, however, had no farther confequences, than that fome flagitious peculators were reftrained from farther milchief, and others put out of the way, having entirely fubfided, the empire was threatened with new dangers from a different quarter, by the appearance of another man, who one while gave himfelf out for Dmitri's, and at another for Schuifkoy's fon, and under both thefe names laid claim to the throne: Happy it was for Alexey and Ruffia, that neither the Poles nor the Swedes, whom the impostor, in reality the fon of a linen-draper, endeavoured to induce to espouse his cause, shewed any great zeal in his fupport; otherwife it is probable that the turbulent times of the former impoftors under the name of Dmitri would have been renewed. On the contrary, however, the pretender very foon fell into the hands of the Ruffians; and, inflead of being promoted to the throne, was raifed to the gallows.

The empire therefore remained quiet within. It was, however, prefently diffurbed on the frontiers towards Poland, with which kingdom a war broke out, originally occafioned by the Kozaks. This people, whofe name is probably of tartarian origin, and fignifies a light armed warrior, took its rife in the fourteenth century, when Kief the primitive ruffian realm, was conjoined with Lithuania*. A great part of the fubjects of the kievian principality being diffatisfied with the lithuanian government, deferted their, country, and fettled in diftricts lying more to the fouthward, almost destitute of people, about the mouth of the Dniepr. For this emigration undoubtedly the catholic clergy were most to blame, who left no means untried to unite the inhabitants of the kievian, now belonging to the lithuanian empire, and who were not catholics, but firmly attached to the greek ritual, to the communion of the church of Rome. Their abhorrence to this union induced them to emigrate; and, as the new colonies formed on the Dniepr by thefe emigrations were always greatly annoyed by the neighbouring Poles, Lithuanians, and Tartars, a particular form of government gradually created itfelf among thefe colonifts, who afterwards obtained the name of Kozaks. It was a military democracy. Every man was a foldier, and the chief (the ataman or hetman) was elected by the voice of the people affembled, which was alfo decifive on every matter of public concern. The Kozaks being at first under tastarian protection, on the diffolution of the tartarian empire, and their numbers being increafed by a multitude of tartarian families that took refuge among them, they acknowledged the king of Poland as their paramount guardian. An attack upon their conftitution, however, which the Poles thought proper to make, and the attempts which the polifh clergy never gave up, to incorporate thefe greek chriftians into the latin church, alienated the minds of the Kozaks from the polifh fupremacy, and induced them to apply for admission under the patronage of Ruffia, especially as the greek mode of christian faith, fo highly revered by them, was predominant in the ruffian empire. Alexey was much difpofed to comply with their wifhes to own him for their guardian fovereign, on their declaration to that effect about the year 1654. Even Nikon, now elevated to the patriarchate.

triarchate, encouraged him not a little to adopt these perfecuted sheep of the orthodox church, and reduce them to the patriarchal fold. His fpiritual motives were convincing enough to Alexey, who was defirous of the fame thing for political reafons, effectially as the tzar might forefee that Poland would not regard this with complacency, but would strive to prevent it by force of arms. On this occasion he was in hopes not only to become the paramount lord of the kozaks, but even perhaps to recover from the Poles what his father had been obliged by a feries of difasters to evacuate to them. It was curious, however, that Alexey, while he earneftly withed to form a connection with the Poles, fhould begin by making complaints, that, in a number of writings published in Poland, the honour of his father and of the empire was infulted. Nay, in compensation for the injuries thereby caft upon him, he directly demanded the restoration of the countries ceded by his father to Poland. The king of Poland rejected the demand, as might eafily be expected. Thus then, on the fide of Ruffia, there was already a pretence for war, which indeed as to its validity feemed flight enough, yet, however, might pafs for a pretence. Besides, the tzar offered to act as mediator between the difcontented kozaks ¢ 3

and the polifh government. But Poland would not accept the mediation, and thus it came to an open rupture between them. In this war the Ruffians, affifted by the kozaks, were fo fuccefsful against Poland, that even the king of Sweden, jealous at Alexey's good fortune, was apprehenfive left the latter might hereafter em. ploy the force he was thus increasing to the detriment of Sweden, and by the vanquishing of one neighbour, might be the more dangerous to him as the other. He, therefore, took precautionary means of defence in cafe of an attack. The Tartars, who came to the affiftance of Poland, in the meantime put a check to Alexey's conquefts; and Lithuania, that fhe might not fall into the hands of the tzar, implored the protection of the king of Sweden. By this ftep Alexey, who thought by conquering Poland to get poffeffion of Lithuania as an appanage to it, felt himfelf affronted, and now alfo, in 1656, broke measures with Sweden. If pillaging, ravaging, defolating, and feizing on towns and villages, and even maffacting unarmed enemies, may be called a fuccefsful war, then it must be faid, that Alexey's arms were likewife fuccefsful in Sweden; but only in those respects. The Ruffians would not dare to contend with the fwedifh warriors face to face in the open field, even even with a far greater superiority of numbers; and therefore Alexey found it highly advisable in 1658 to conclude a three years' truce with Sweden, which three years afterwards, in 1661, was confirmed into a peace, at which it was agreed that, difregarding all that had paffed between the two powers, everything fhould be fixed on the former footing, as had been fettled at the treaty of peace made at Stolbova in 1617. But Alexey's war with Poland terminated more honourably for Ruffia. An armiftice for thirteen years, agreed upon at Andruffof in Lithuania in 1667, and afterwards prolonged from time to time, was the forerunner of a complete pacification, which was brought to effect in 1686, and reftored to the empire Smolensk, Severia, Tchernigof, and Kief, that primeval principality of the ruffian tzars. The king of Poland likewife relinguished the supremacy he had hitherto afferted over the kozaks to the tzar; and that people became now a protected relative of the ruffian empire.

Succefsful as Alexey had been against the Poles, his empire, nevertheles, had nearly fallen into new intestine troubles. Dolgoruki, the ruffian commander, caused an officer of the Don-kozaks to be hanged, and thereby, in the opinion of the kozaks, grievously infringed their liberty. c 4 A brother

A brother of the deceafed, therefore, Stenka (Stephen) Radzin, found no difficulty in enticing numbers of his countrymen, under pretence that attempts were making to contract their privileges, to ftand forth and revenge the infult committed on them all by putting to death this member of their community. Prompted by a love of licentioufncfs, plunder, and exceffes of all kinds, which Radzin allowed, his followers rallied round his banner, foon increafed to great numbers, particularly attracted by the piratical expeditions on the Cafpian, and even to Perfia, in which confiderable booty was to be made. In the meantime the proceedings of this fellow, and the crew that had flocked to him, were not confined to the kozaks: he fent out feveral of his people, who founded forth the praifes of their great leader in various parts of the country, and took advantage of every flight murmur against the government, every expression of discontent at one ordinance or another of the tzar, for oftentatiously promifing help and redrefs to every kind of oppreflion, by the arm of their mighty Radzin. These envoys took particular care to raise hopes in the populace that Radzin would deliver them from the gripe of power. Radzin himfelf proceeded to greater excelles from day to day. As many of the Ruffians fill adhered to the patriarch triarch Nikon, who had been depofed and fent into a monastery, he fpread it abroad that Nikon was with him, that even the eldeft of the tzarian princes had put himfelf under his protection, and that he had been requested by the tzar himfelf to come to Mofco, in order by his afliftance to rid himfelf of those unpatriotic grandees by whom, to the misfortune of the empire, he was unhappily furrounded. These artifices, together. with the permiffion to rob and plunder all without fcruple, which Radzin granted to every one that came to his flandard, were a lure which operated fo ftrongly, that the rebel found himfelf at length at the head of 200,000 men. Indeed his power was not formidable, though his numbers were fo great. Without discipline, without knowledge in the art of war, most of his adherents even without inclination to fight, what was to be dreaded from fuch a banditti when oppofed by a military force? for it was not a manly ardour and courage that had collected this band about Radzin, but rapine and the thirst of plunder. Accordingly, how little fervice this great mafs was of to the man himfelf, and how little qualified he was to bring them into a well regulated activity, and how deftitute he was of the neceffary prudence for acting fuch a part as he had adopted, was feen at length in his fuffering himfelf himfelf to be perfuaded that the tzar had forgiven him, and was defirous of nothing more than to fee him at Mofco. Radzin put implicit faith in this report, on the declaration of an ataman of the Don-kozaks, and travelled thither with his brother. Though the latter repeatedly reprefented to him on the journey that punishment and death would more probably be their lot at Mofco than a pardon, yet Radzin was still fimple enough to truft in the affurance he had received, and only perceived his miltake -certainly too late - when at a little diftance from the capital, he was accosted by a gallows in a cart which had been fent to meet him : a terrible harbinger of the fate that awaited him there. - His execution had the proper effect on his accomplices, who gradually difperfed : and though another mifcreant took upon him to play Radzin's part, yet the party did not long hold together. Aftrakhan, the chief feat of these Russians, where Radzin had for some time ruled with unlimited fway, and where he had refolved to take up his refidence as king of Aftrakhan, was furrounded by the ruffian troops; and twelve thousand of Radzin's followers - as a dreadful example to all future rebels - were gibbeted on the high roads of Aftrakhan. Such was the catastrophe of an enterprife which might have have been attended with lamentable confequences to the ruffian empire if Radzin had only been as prudent as he was daring. Diffurbances of a very extensive nature might in that case perhaps have been easily excited, especially as a great part of the warlike nation of kozaks were implicated in the rebellion.

The turkish emperor, in the meantime, had not looked on with complacency from the very beginning, while Alexey was taking meafures for making himfelf protector of the kozaks, as Ruffia by this nation obtained a ftrong rampart against the incursions of the Tartars dependent on the turkish empire, who were perpetually infefting the ruffian territory. He accordingly ftrove to prevent it; first by farther humbling Poland, already weakened by Alexey's forces, and then by attacking Ruffia. In 1671 the Turks made themfelves mafters of Kaminietz, a fortrefs on the frontiers belonging to Poland, and extended themfelves throughout the Ukraine. At the treaty of Andruffof the Ruffians and Poles having promifed mutual affiftance to each other against their mohammedan neighbour, Alexey was obliged now, in purfuance of that agreement, again to take arms. In order to give employment to the Turks on all fides, and totally to reduce the inveterate foe to his empire, empire, Alexey fent ambafladors to feveral of the chriftian potentates, exhorting them to take part in the war against the implacable enemy of the christian name. But the christian potentates had fimilar bufinefs enough of their own, and were obliged to be perpetually on their guard against the depredations of each other. Accordingly, the general league of the chriftians against the Turks was never brought to effect, and only remained a pious with of the tzar. - The turkish army being for fome years fucceflively victorious, and making many conquefts in Poland, was confequently becoming every day more dangerous to the tzar. At length, however, a ftop was put to their conquests by the great commander Sobiefky, who fmoothed his way to the throne by his victorious arms against these enemies of his country. Indeed Alexey had formed the project for making one of his fons king of Poland, and fo to unite that kingdom with his own; but the plan proved abortive. He did not live to fee the termination of the war with the Turks, in which Alexey had taken a very active part. His death happened in 1676; and it is highly probable that he fell a victim to the empyrical remedies of an old polifh woman, in whom he had more confifidence than in his phyficians.

That Alexey was fuccefsful in his wars with Poland; that he procured a reflitution of the countries torn from his empire, and laid the foundation of a fovereignty over the kozaks, were not his only merits in behalf of Ruffia. He was as provident for the improvement of the 'empire within, as for its aggrandizement without. He in a particular manner attached to himfelf the gratitude of his fubjects, by a reformation of the laws, in which he confulted the nobility, the clergy, and the clafs of burghers. He encouraged the trade of the country, and was attentive to advance the cultivation of the empire : whereas formerly the prifoners of war always belonged as flaves to those who had taken them, he acted far more wifely, by fending the captives from the enemy into uncultivated regions, that they might be peopled by their means. The mildness of his government allured Germans, Dutch, Italians, and about three thousand Scotsmen into Russia. He had already formed the defign, which his fon Peter afterwards put into execution, of making the Ruffians acquainted with the art of conftructing fhips and with maritime commerce, and refolved to keep merchant-fhips in the Calpian; but Radzin's rebellion had frustrated the attempts to that end which he had already made. Ruffia had therefore yet much to expect from Alexey, if

if death had not prematurely carried him off in the forty-feventh year of his age.

It may with the flricteft justice be affirmed, that under Alexey the ruffian empire made fome progrefs in civilization, and that this prince, in many refpects, already trod the path which his fon Peter afterwards purfued with more firm and certain fteps.

For the better understanding of the transactions that next enfued in the reigning family, which, as it could not be otherwife, had great influence on the empire itself, I shall here mention the manner in which the tzars of Ruffia were wont to felect their conforts - a manner that indeed had a nearer refemblance with afiatic than with european cuftoms. When a tzar was refolved to marry, the most beautiful of the unmarried daughters of the country, particularly of the principal families, were fummoned to court. They appeared in their holiday cloaths, met with fumptuous entertainment; and the young lady who had the good fortune to be chosen by the tzar for his bride remained at court, while the reft were difmiffed with favours *. Indeed it is possible that in most cales eafes it was determined prior to this exhibition on which of the fair the election would fall. — By this practice, therefore, all that influence which foreign princeffes as conforts fo often exercife over the fovereign, and through them upon the interefts of the country, was prevented : this mode obferved by the tzars in contracting marriage had a tendency likewife to what all of them prior to Peter the Great feemed most to defire, that this empire fhould have as little connection with other countries as poffible *. But even this election of a tzaritza from

* The following is delivered as the true flate of the bufinels by that profound ruffian antiquarian M. Boltin : Inquiries from the daughters of the natives proved at times the fruitful fource of the difafters to the empire, as the relations of the new tzaritza, by the affiftance of their aunts, now raifed to be great ladies, ftrove to make themfelves of confequence, and did not always purfue this aim by the directefl means; as, for example, in the cafe of Boris. Should it happen that a tzar married more than once, then a door was imme-

' Inquiries were privately made after the most beautiful and fenfible young women of the country; but no ukafes were ever iffued to that effect, as has been pretended by fome foreign authors. Some of the principal lords and ladies received the commiffion to bring fuch as they deemed the worthieft to the houfe of the monarch, where each of them found a decent chamber ready for her reception. They ate all at one table, and various kinds of pattime were provided for their amufement. The monarch observed them privately and liftened to their conversations. It is affirmed by fome that he even vitited them by night, in order to fee which of them flept quietly or unquictly. After reiterated vilitation and infpection of the underflandings, tempers, and difpolitions, and having made up his mind in confequence, Ire came and fat down at table with them, where he prefented her on whom he had fixed his choice for a bride with a handkerchief and a ring. On the fame day he difmiffed the reft from his house with prefents conlifting of the feveral articles of drefs. The name of the bride cleft was then publicly declared, and the title of grand-princefs conferred upon her. diately

elately opened to the fpirit of faction: feveral families became related to the fovereign; one exerting itfelf to circumvent the other; the new relations endeavouring by all means to fubvert the elder. The cafe here fuppofed, by no means advantageous to the empire, actually happened with Alexey. He married twice; and herein lay principally the foundation of the troubles which threatened to break out immediately on his death; and though at that time fuppreffed, burft forth with greater violence and fury, fix years afterwards, when Feodor died.

Two princes, named Feodor and Ivan, and fix princeffes, of whom Sophia afterwards made herfelf particularly famous, were the children of the first, Peter and Natalia the offspring of the fecond marriage, whom Alexey left behind him at his death. By his first confort, born a Miloflaffkoy, the family of Miloflaffkoy acquired great influence at court ; which, however, declined on Alexey's marrying a fecond time a Narishkin, and this confort favoured her relations. As now, moreover, the two princes of the former marriage, Feodor and Ivan, were not only of a very feeble temperament, but also appeared to have no great intellectual abilities, (which was particularly the cafe with Ivan,) it was natural for the Narifskin family to con-VOL. II. ceive Ð

ceive the defign of nominating, after Alexey's death, the young Peter, fourteen years of age, the only prince of the fecond marriage, as fucceffor to his father, and to exclude the two elder princes, on account of their incapacity, from the fuccession. But this project failed : Feodor was appointed tzar; and, though he was fickly and infirm of body, and this infirmity was even increafed by an illnefs fhortly after his acceffion to the throne, yet he proved, that the conclution from the weaknefs of his body to an imbecility of mind was too hafty. On the contrary, during his reign of fix years he displayed many excellent talents for government; and it was much to be lamented, that the tenement of his fpirit was fo frail. . The war against the Turks which he inherited from his father he profecuted four years longer, and terminated it in 1680 by a truce for twenty years, by which the Turks not only reaped no advantage, but were compelled to acknowledge the fovereignty of the tzars over the Kozaks, whom the fultan was greatly defirous to incorporate with his empire.

The pains beftowed by Feodor in his adminiftration related chiefly to the interior of the empire; evincing in the whole of his conduct that the benefit of his people was his ruling object, object. In a country like Ruffia, where even after all the trouble that Alexey had taken to form a code of laws, there were not statutes adapted to all cafes, too many opportunities offered where chicane or money could influence the decifion of the judge. The offices of the magistrature were almost exclusively filled by the nobility; and it was extremely difficult for any of the burghers or peafantry, and for the poor almost impossible, to gain a verdict, even though the law was on their fide, whenever the adverfary was a noble or a wealthy man, as the former was commonly favoured by the court on account of his rank, and the latter for the weighty arguments which he brought. Indeed under Alexey's government fome great men, as before related, received fad wages for their iniquities; but thefe examples prefently loft their warning virtue, and Feodor faw himfelf obliged to make it a primary object of his care that law and equity were impartially administered, and that even the poor and needy of his fubjects should at least have justice. - With equal diligence he provided that the necessaries of life should not be kept at too high a price, nor the dealers in them opprefs the poor. For the encouragement of perfons in flender circumflances, defirous to engage in ufeful undertakings that D 2 exceeded exceeded their means, he affifted them with pecuniary advances for feveral years. Mofco was already indebted to his father for having a well conftituted police: he added to it many wife regulations, and at length crowned his reign by an ordinance, eminently important and beneficial to the empire, by which he gave a violent blow to the hurtful and ridiculous conceit of privileges of birth.

Nothing could equal the care with which the noble families kept the books of their pedigrees, in which were fet down, not only every one of their anceftors, but also the posts and offices which these their forefathers held at court, in the army, or in the civil department. Had these genealogies and registers of descent ceen confined to the purpole of determining the anceftry and the relationship of families, no objection could be alleged against them. But these books of record were carried to the most abfurd abufe, attended with a hoft of pernicious confequences. If a nobleman were appointed to a post in the army or at court, or to some civil flation, and it appeared that the perfon to whom he was now fubordinate numbered fewer anceftors than he, it was with the utmost difficulty that he could be brought to accept of the office to which he was called. Nay, this folly was was carried still greater lengths: a man would even refuse to take upon him an employ, if thereby he would be fubordinate to one whofe enceftors formerly flood under the anceftors of him who was now offered the place. It is easy to imagine that a prejudice of this kind must have been productive of the most disagreeable effects, and that difcontents, murmurs at flights and triffing neglects, difputes, quarrels, and diforders in the fervice, must have been its natural attendants. It was therefore become indifpenfably neceffary that a particular office fhould be inftituted at court, in which exact copies of the genealogical tables and fervice-registers of the noble families were deposited; and this office was inceffantly employed in fettling the numberlefs difputes that arofe from this inveterate prejudice. Feodor, obferving the pernicious effects of this fond conceit that the father's capacity must necessarily devolve on the fon, and that confequently he ought to inherit his pofts, wifhed to put a ftop to it; and, with the advice of his fagacious minister prince Vafiilly Galitzin, of whom we shall frequently have occasion to fpeak, fell upon the following method for put_ ting an end to this ridiculous practice. He caufed it to be proclaimed, that all the families should deliver into court faithful copies of their

their fervice-rolls, in order that they might be corrected of a number of errors that had crept into them. This delivery being made, he convoked the great men and the fuperior clergy before him. In eloquent speeches it was reprefented to them by him in arguments drawn from reason, and by the patriarch in arguments drawn from religion, that the prejudice which had hitherto prevailed of forming pretenfions from the pofts that had been filled by their anceftors, was as irrational as it was contrary to the dictates of christianity, which required humility and brotherly love. Thefe difcourfes being ended, the affembly were afked their opinion, when they unanimoufly affented; the generality however not from full conviction to the judgment of the tzar and the patriarch. No fooner was this affent declared, than the whole heap of these records of fervice was brought into the fquare before the palace, and, in prefence of the clergy and a multitude of noblemen, --- burnt to ashes. By way of conclusion to this fingular ccremony, the patriarch denounced an anathema against every one who should prefume to contravene this ordinance of the tzar; and the justice of the fentence was ratified by the affembly in a general fhout of Amen. It was by no means Feodor's intention to efface nobility; 0* and.

and accordingly he ordered new books to be made in which the noble families were inferibed; but thus was abolifhed that extremely pernicious cuftom which made it a difgrace to be under the orders of another if his anceftry did not reach fo high, or even — in cafe of equal pedigree if a forefather of the commander had once been fubordinate in the fervice to the progenitor of him who was now to acknowledge him for his fuperior.

Feodor, therefore, did much good in his generation, combated many prejudices, and contributed what he could to roufe his people from , that fluggifhnefs which generally prevailed among them; by many of his actions strove to cure them of the idle notion, that every thing is beft as it is; and therefore that nothing fhould be altered. He deftroyed, as we have just feen; the extravagant pretenfions of the nobility, fo highly detrimental to the ftate; in like manner he did away the prejudice that the tzaritza must always be a native Ruffian, by marrying a lady of Poland, for whom he had conceived an affection, and roundly told the patriarch, on his declaring the marriage invalid, that he either never would marry at all, or only according to his private inclination: upon which the former retracted. He attempted to bring about an alteration D4

alteration in the national drefs of the Ruffians, which had more of the afiatic than the european ; not by a decree, as Peter afterwards did, but by appointing, occafionally, fellivitics at court, and making it a condition on all who would partake in them, that they flould appear in a particular drefs fomewhat altered by him, and bearing a resemblance to the polish. - Thus Feodor in many refpects fet a pattern to his great fucceffor Peter. It was much to be wifhed that the period of his life had been protracted *; but the empire would more deeply still have felt his lofs, if he had not been fucceeded by Peter, who flrove to complete the good which Alexey and Feodor had begun, who brought to maturity what they had fown, who combined with the talents for government, which feemed hereditary in the house of Romanof, a more reftless zeal, a more indefatigable activity than his predeceffors poffeffed ; and by his deeds as fovereign acquired that renown which has claffed him with the greatest monarchs.

Feodor's death in 1682 was in a manner the fignal for fanguinary feenes, being the occasion of a ftruggle for the fovereignty of the empire, between brother and fifter, which lasted fixteen years, and in 1698 * terminated in favour of Peter, the brother.

* "Feodor lived," fays the ruffian historian Sumarokof, " the joy and delight of his people, and died amidft " their fighs and tears. On the day he died Mofeo was " in the fame flate of diffrefs as Rome was on the death " of Titus."

Feodor had already been aware that Ivan, half-blind, and in general very infirm, was not adequate to the bufinefs of a tzar of Ruffia, and for that reafon had fhortly before his death ordained, that his ftep-brother Peter, then ten years old, who already discovered uncommon abilities; fhould be his fuccefior. Ivan himfelf avowed his incapacity for governing, and would willingly now have relinquished the throne to Peter, as he afterwards actually did; but to this SOPHIA, the own fifter of Feodor and Ivan, and half-fister of Peter, would not affent. This princefs was just then in the full bloom of vouth, of exquifite beauty, and of rare accomplifhments. She had ambition enough to afpire to the throne, courage enough to make her way to it by any kind of means, and prudence enough to have maintained herfelf upon it +.

* When Sophia's laft effort, the rebellion of the Strelitzes, raifed by her and her party in Peter's absence, was defeated.

+ Peter himfelf afterwards frequently faid, that if his fifter had bridled her ambition, he would have left to her the helm of government, and contentedly have ferved his country under her authority.

That

That Ivan, a prince of the former marriage, was intended to be paffed by in the fucceffion to the throne, furnished her with the fittest pretence for making herfelf of confequence. She took upon her the tone of a patronels of the claims of her full brother, demanding justice apparently for him alone, regardless of herfelf. Accordingly, in the fame proportion as the Nariflikin party were endeavouring to promote Peter's fucceffion, Sophia was industrious in contriving to oppofe it. In order to facilitate the accomplishment of her defign, she fecured to herfelf, by promifes and money, the concurrence of the strelitzes, that band of foldiers who at Mofco were what the janifaries are at Conftantinople, a corps which, by its ftrength, confifting of upwards of 14,000 men, were enabled to give powerful fupport to any plot. To get rid of the Narishkins, as the friends and dependants of prince Peter, was the first and grand aim of Sophia, as by that means fhe hoped to have a freer scope for her stratagems. To effect this the more readily, a rumour was fpread that the Narishkins were guilty of Feodor's death; that foreign phyficians, bribed by this family, had dispatched the tzar by poifon, and their relations only wanted to raife Peter to the throne, and to that end to exclude, nay even to murder -Sophia's

Sophia's own brother Ivan, who had a prior right. The efforts of the Narishkins to procure the fucceffion for Peter, which were not to be diffembled, gave to this report an air of probability, which every method was used to reduce to certainty. The beautiful Sophia, by her arts of perfuasion, ingenioufly gave impreffion to thefe allegations, particularly among the chiefs of the ftrelitzes, while her creatures were inceffantly affiduous in gaining over the common people of that body by various artifices. Galitzin, Feodor's wife and active minifter *, was alfo Sophia's favourite and counfellor; and even the vulgar owned it to be reafonable that the crown should be given to prince Ivan, as the eldest fon. Sophia was therefore preparing to afcend the throne; for that was her real intention, though fhe concealed it under her fifterly love for Ivan, who in that cafe would never have had any thing more than the title of tzar, as was afterwards plainly feen. Hitherto, indeed, it feemed as if Sophia had no defign of making any attempts against the life of Peter; but some years

* To this a foreigner, who at that time lived in Ruffia, bears the following teftimony: He was polite, fertile in invention, and of greater fagacity than any of his countrymen; of an active mind, diligent; was, in underftanding, far beyond his times, and capable of working a great alteration in Ruffia, if his time and authority had been commenfurate with his inclination.

after fhe shewed, by her actions, that she would have made no fcruple of facrificing this halfbrother to her ambition. Sophia would perhaps too have found'arguments fufficient for juftifying her conduct, and for proving to her country and to the world that fhe was neceffitated fo to act for the benefit of the empire. Had flie then, supported by Galitzin, a shrewd and enterprifing man, and whom, as has fince been believed, flie would have owned for her hufband, wifely and happily conducted her reign, it would fcarcely ever have been mentioned, perhaps it would even gradually have been forgotten, that the made her way to the throne over the corpfe of her brother. But fate would have it otherwife. Peter, the perfecuted prince, was to conquer all plots and machinations against him, and at length to become fole monarch ; while Sophia, for her often unfuccefsful, but always repeated attempts to place herfelf on the throne, was doomed at length to do penance by the lofs of her liberty.

In perfect confiftence with her plan, by which the ftrelitzes had been dextroufly enticed, the whole crew of them conforted together foon after Feodor's death, committed all manner of exceffes for three days in fucceflion, in which they met with no check whatever, facrificed to their their fury feveral of the chief officers of state, that were against Sophia, forced their way even into the palace of the tzars, and demanded the death of the Narishkins *, who, as they pretended, were bent on depriving Ivan of the throne, and then of his life. At length they declared by acclamation prince Ivan to be tzar. He, however, having a fincere affection for his half-brother Peter, wished him to be co-fovereign with him; which was granted: but Sophia was at the fame time declared co-fovereign with the two tzars. This was on the 6th of May 1681, and in June the coronation of Ivan and Peter was folemnized in due form. Sophia immediately married tzar Ivan, in order that if any children were born of this marriage, Peter might lofe for ever all hope of obtaining the crown. Thus, one flep of Sophia's fucceeded; fhe had now the government in her hands; for Ivan,

* Two brothers of the widowed tzaritza Natalia, Alexey's fecond confort, of the family of Narifikin, were murdered. This was the fatal lot in all of about fixty perfons, moftly of the firft diffinction. The Miloflaffkys, Sophia's kinfmen, were particularly bufy in this fedition. The property of fuch as were executed was confifcated and divided among the ftrelitzes. A public monument was likewife crected, on which the names of the deceafed were inferibed, as traitors to their country.

from his imbecility, and Peter from his youth, being only ten years of age, had nothing more than the title of tzars. Their names ftood at bottom of the decrees and ordinances that were iffued; but Sophia and her favourite Galitzin were alone their authors. Afterwards, in the year 1687, Sophia began to add her name to those of the tzars, and to cause her image to be ftamped on the coin.

In the meantime, the ftrelitzes whom Sophia had chofen as her inftruments in the downfal which the had prepared for Peter, had nearly, after that first infurrection in her favour, been dangerous to herfelf. Prince Kovanskoi, their commander, who was privy to the plans of Sophia, had probably too much ambition for fubmitting to be the paffive inftrument by which fhe was to obtain the fovereign power, alfo might be defirous of having himfelf a thare in the government, and was accordingly jealous of Galitzin. The propofal which he made to Sophia, that fhe would marry one of her fifters to his fon, perhaps caufed fome alarm on account of the confequences by which it might poffibly be attended; and her refufal, which made Kovanfkoi the adverfary of Sophia, wrought alfo fo powerfully on his ftrelitzes, that Sophia, the two tzars, and the whole court were reduced to the the neceffity of making the ftrong monastery of the Trinity, twelve leagues from Mofco, their fanctuary. Ere, however, the enraged strelitzes could follow them thither, the court collected together a great body of armed foldiers, among whom were many foreigners. Kovanskoi being taken prifoner, was beheaded; and as the firelitzes, still more exasperated by this act, were advancing against the monastery, they learnt that they were likely to meet with a ftout refiftance there. This intelligence immediately converted their apparent courage into defpondency, and their fury into confternation. The court demanded that the principal ringleaders should be delivered up, which was done; and, moreover, the tenth man of every regiment was felected as a victim for the reft. These wretches, thus decimated, being condemned to die at Mofco, where most of the strelitzes were stationary, took an affectionate leave of their wives and children, prepared themfelves for death by receiving the facrament, and went back to the monastery in fuch order, that every two of them carried a block, and the third was the bearer of an axe. In this tremendous proceffion, attended by a great concourse of people, particularly of their relations, they came to the place before the monaftery, laid their heads on the blocks they had brought brought with them, and in that fituation waited their doom, which at length amounted to this, that fome of the most guilty were made an atonement for all. Sophia henceforward placed no more confidence in the strelitzes. The majority of them were draughted off into the other regiments on the frontiers, in order to remove them from the capital *.

This infurrection being quelled, all now wore a tranquil appearance; and the government, which Sophia had in her hands, proceeded in the ordinary courfe. Certain perfons, however, of both parties, that is, the friends of Sophia and of Peter, were in the meantime very bufy in private. The former to preferve the government in the hands of that princefs, and the latter to ravifh it from her in time, and to confer it upon Peter. A good opportunity foon offered for the party of this tzar to raife clamours againft Vaffilly Galitzin the favourite of Sophia, and the meafures they purfued; and thus to take one flep in behalf of Peter. In 1686 the peace abovementioned † was concluded with Poland.

* The beforementioned monument, a tellimony of rewarded infurrection, diffionourable to the government, was removed, and another with a warning against rebellion fet up in its place.

But

But new hostilities with Turkey foon broke out. The Turks were at the fame time involved in a war with Poland and with the german emperor. Both powers follicited the court of Ruffia to take part in the contest, in order to employ the common foe on the fide of the krimean Tartars. Sophia at first would not hearken to this request. But among the few great men whole counfel was of any moment, were feveral fecret friends to Peter. These shewed by a multitude of arguments, that it behoved them, as tending to the good of the country, to cut out more work for the fultan; already haraffed on two fides, and thus by dividing to weaken his forces. Doubtless thefe advifers cared lefs about weakening the Turks than of leffening the credit of the prefent administration. They forefaw that little glory would redound from this war, and were in hopes that the difpleafure, if it turned out badly, would fall upon Sophia. Besides, a war offered the best means for getting rid of Galitzin, and in his abfence of being more active in favour of Peter, who now already [1686] fhewed himfelf worthy of fitting on the throne of his anceftors. They were therefore fo inceffant, and fo earnest in their follicitations with Sophia and Galitzin, and afferted fo vehemently that Galitzin was the only man qualified for conducting this war with fuc-VOL. cefs, that the latter, though fo ftrenuoufly against it at the first, at length complied, and put himfelf at the head of the army. He was thoroughly fenfible of what his enemies knew, and what the fequel proved, that he had no talents for a military commander. He confumed the whole campaign in marches and countermarches, without gaining, though with an army of 300,000 men, a fingle advantage over the enemy, and yet 40,000 of his people fell facrifices to this fruitlefs campaign. Indeed the friends of Sophia and Galitzin were continually caufing falle accounts of victories gained by the Ruffians to be circulated in Mofco; and, cafting the blame of the failure of the campaign on the hetman of the kozaks, whom they actually fent to Siberia, on difbanding the foldiers at the end of the campaign they even distributed rewards among them - for nothing. But all this did not impofe upon the people; and a general averfion enfued against Sophia and Galitzin, which was greatly increafed by an equal want of fuccefs in the following campaign of 1687. Undoubtedly one circumstance contributed in no finall degree to diminish the lustre of both these campaigns, that one part of the army wifhed well to Peter, and therefore was not defirous that Galitzin should be fuccefsful, and the influence of him and Sophia

Sophia be thereby augmented, but rather dc-voutly hoped to fee the downfall of the prefent government and the elevation of Peter *.

Peter's friends, during the absence of Galitzin, were extremely industrious in fupporting the claims of that prince to the abfolute monarchy. The following was one of the methods adopted for forming a party in his behalf. He repaired to a village not far from Mosco, where he admitted a number of young people to his company and into his fervice, many of whom were fons of the principal families of the empire. They were generally called the tzar's playmates +, and it even feemed at first, that the object of this connection was nothing more than diversion, entertainment, and pleasure. The real aim of it, however, was far greater and more extensive; for the youths who here daily affociated with Peter acquired fuch an attachment to his perfon as was never to be effaced, and became his most faithful adherents. The probability that he would one day be fole tzar brought conftantly new acceffions of young men into this fociety; and it grew up into a fmall company, at the head of which was Lefort *. The tzar himfelf began as a drummer, and ferved

* It cannot be doubted that Lefort had great influence in the forming of Peter's character, and on his undertakings afterwards, though all that Peter did cannot properly be afcribed to him; for, without the thirft of knowledge, the perfeverance and the unabated emulation by which the latter was actuated, all his intercourfe with Lefort would have operated nothing. On a different foil the fame feed would never have come to maturity, much lefs have borne the fruit it did with Peter. Lefort was born at Geneva in 1652, and defigned by his parents for commerce. But his active mind and lively imagination led him into a diffolute way of life, in confequence of which he got deeply in debt, and in consequence of his debts left Geneva, went to Marfeilles, and became a cadet. After remaining there fome time, he travelled to Holland, enlifted under an officer who was railing foldiers for tzar Alexey, and fo came to Archangel. Alexey in the meantime dying, no farther concern was taken at Archangel about the new raifed foreign troops. Upon this Lefort proceeded to Molco, where he as fpeedily made himfelf mafter of the ruffian language, as he had before acquired the dutch and german, and became fecretary to the danish ambassador. His striking figure and engaging manners procured him accefs to the most diffinguished families, and he foon married a young lady with a large fortune. In these circumstances he found an opportunity of making himfelf known to the tzar, who prefently felt an attachment for the foreigner who had entirely educated himfelf, and who, without any literary acquirements, poffeffed extensive knowledge, and became his avowed patron and friend. Peter learnt dutch and german of ferved progreffively upwards through the feveral ranks, as every one was obliged to do who was admitted into this corps. The novelty of the affair, the affability of Peter, and Lefort's exertions, co-operated in continually adding to its numbers; fo that in a fhort time the village was too fmail to contain it, and a part was obliged to remove into another. Sophia at first forefaw none of the effects which might, and indeed muft of him, and Lefort was his daily companion. The tzar, finding between him and Lefort fuch a conformity of inclinations and ideas, made him the confident of all his projects, and conftantly applied to him for advice. He even authorized him to check him in his extravagances, and to foothe him in those bursts of passion to which he was unfortunately fubject, and fometimes, mixing with the intoxication arifing from strong liquors, rendered him furious. At such times only Lefort could dare to fpeak to him; and, in reproving him for his intemperance and madnefs, he has even been known to use violence for checking his impetuous career. It was not, however, without danger that Lefort could venture on these bold offices of zeal. Peter was once on the point of flabbing him; but on regaining the equipoife of his mind, he embraced Lefort and afked his pardon. Peter having given him a company, next made him general, then admiral, lived with him on the footing of a friend, and on his death interred him like a prince. Pity that Lefort, by his excelles in the early part of life, brought on himfelf a premature death, being only in his forty-fixth year when he died. E. 3.

naturally flow from fuch an inflitution; or, perhaps, fhe thought herfelf too fecure to allow any fuggestion of alarm to enter her mind, and took no farther notice of it than as an infignificant youthful pastime. Besides, as several of this company, with whom the tzar was extremely familiar, Lefort, a certain Galitzin *, and others, lived rather diforderly, had frequent entertainments, carouzings, and the like jovial parties, and were therefore more likely to lead Peter into extravagancies, than to ufeful knowledge and to habits of activity, Sophia gave herfelf no concern about them, in the hopes that this licentious mode of life would prevent the tzar from turning his mind to the affairs of government, might even at length draw upon him the odium of the nation, and thereby confirm her authority the more. But the was miltaken. Amidst the libertinifm and diffipation in which Peter was apparently paffing his days, his great mind was ever watchful, his understanding was unfolding itfelf from day to day, and his activity was constantly increasing. Lefort imparted to him much knowledge in their conversations, at their repasts, and even over their wine, called his attention to a variety of objects, rouzed his curio-

fity, explained to him fuch difficulties as he ftarted, and Peter now foon began to reflect on himfelf, on his station, and on the nature of the country which he was called to govern. He then made it his bufinels to gain fome knowledge in the arts of policy and war. Lefort, who had been an attentive obferver of whatever had paffed within his view, had acquired a confiderable ftore of various kinds of information, and was naturally of a thoughtful and penetrating difpofition, at the fame time ingenious in using the skill and experience he had acquired, took every occasion of instilling into Peter's mind the improvements and advantages of other kingdoms and states, in regard to military discipline, government, laws, commerce, arts, manufactures, and trade. Peter prefently felt an ardent defire to procure these advantages to his empire. To this end it was abfolutely neceffary that he should have the government folely in his own hands. As throughout the whole ruffian hiftory to that time there had not been one example of a female reign; as Peter, who had now attained his feventeenth year, had a right to claim the government, the incapacity of Ivan being generally allowed; in fhort, encouraged by the unanimous intreaty of his friends and adherents to fecure to himfelf the fole fovereignty, the spirit of ------

of Peter was rouzed. The very prince whom Sophia had all along regarded as a frivolous youth, fit for no continued and regular courfe of action, and incompetent to the arduous affairs of government, difplayed all at once fuch a fpirit of enterprife, with fuch energy and perfeverance in whatever he undertook, that Sophia and her party were alarmed, the friends and adherents of Peter were delighted and concurred zealoufly with him, while the nation at large admired and feared the courageous tzar.

In July 1689 the difagreements between Peter and Sophia came to a formal rupture *, on occafion of the meeting at a folemn office of religion. Peter was prefent as tzar, and Sophia infifted on attending the folemnity as regent; it is even affirmed that fhe demanded the principal place. This Peter refueed to allow; Sophia was peremptory in her claim; on which the tzar entirely withdrew in difpleafure. The theatre on which the fovereignty was to be contended for was now opened, the two parties had in a manner declared war, a war which must end in the withory of the one and the downfall of the other,

* Sophia and Peter had had frequent altercations, when the latter frequented the fittings of the national council where fhe prefided, and would not accommodate himfelf to her inclination in everything.

Peter,

Peter, with his court and his friends, repaired in the month of August once more to the fortified monaftery of the holy trinity, whither he was followed by most of the foreigners among the troops, officers and privates, as his bodyguard to fecure his perfon from an attack. Sophia now again threw herfelf into the arms of the strelitzes. Their leader, named Scheglovitoï, engaged to remove Peter out of the way, but - the project mifcarried. In the mean time, as a great number of defenders had reforted to Peter, as even the public voice of the nation was on the fide of the enterprifing tzar, and as particularly the black defign of Sophia to have him made away with had degraded her still lower in the eyes of the people; and the strelitzes, as they had already shewn, not being foldiers on whole bravery any reliance could be made, the co-fovereign held it best to abandon the way of violence and to adopt the arts of gentlenefs. She offered her hand to an accommodation, and fent mediators to that purpole; but Peter convinced them of Sophia's base defigns, and they remained with him. Sophia at length fet out herfelf. On the road fhe was met by perfons fent from Peter, who informed her that he would not fpeak to her, and ordered, as tzar, the immediate furrender of the commander mander of the strelitzes. He was beheaded, and the other confpirators punished. Galitzin paid forfeit by an exile to the borders of Archangel *, and the co-fovereign Sophia had her head shaved and was obliged to retire to a nunnery under the name of fifter Sufanna. - Thus Peter now fat without a partner upon the throne to which his right had been contefted; for Ivan, though he lived till 1696, was a mere nonentity. He was passive in all these transactions, and both from reverence and affection for Peter had never approved of the machinations of his fister against his brother. - On the eleventh of September a proclamation was made, that for the future in all public papers and records the name of the late regent Sophia would no longer be mentioned.

No fooner had Peter the fole fovereignty in his hands than he gave the most unequivocal proofs of his active mind, and shewed that he was thoroughly acquainted with the defects and infirmities of his empire. He plainly perceived that a disciplined, well-trained valiant army, according to the present establishment in other countries, was much wanted in his own; and accordingly

accordingly he made it one of his first bufineffes, as monarch, to put the army on a better footing. Except a few regiments stationed on the frontiers, the ftrelitzes at Mofco were the only ftanding troops; and that thefe poffefied lefs courage and discipline than brutal ferocity, they had furnished feveral glaring proofs. On the breaking out of a war, befides the strelitzes, the nobility were fummoned to the field with their retainers: but they appeared undifciplined, armed in various methods, fome well-cloathed but others in ragged array. Such a conflitution was attended by many difadvantages : Peter therefore refolved to form a great ftanding army, to be at once better disciplined and better exercised; and to this end he appointed Gordon, a Scotfman, and Lefort, the Genevan, to raife regiments *, which in their whole constitution, drefs, and military exercifes should be formed entirely after the model of the european troops.

* Lefort had a regiment of 12,000 men. The greater part, as in Gordon's regiments, confifted of foreigners. In Lefort's regiments there were about 300 huguenots alone who had fled from France on account of the revocation of the edict of Nantes in 1685. Among Gordon's foldiers were great numbers of Scotfmen who had left their native country on account of the troubles with which it was then afflicted.

While

While Peter was thus industriously employed in reforming his army, he conceived the ftill more ardent defire of having a navy, and foon fet himfelf to work at its accomplishment. What first prompted his zeal to this undertaking was the following circumftance, though it would certainly have arifen fooner or later in Peter's mind without that occasion. Being at a pleafure-house of his father's he faw an english boat lying neglected. This attracted his ever-active curiofity; and, in the course of his inquiries about it, he learnt that the builder of this veffel was Brandt, a Dutchman, who was still living in Mofco. The boat-builder was immediately fent for and received orders from Peter to conftruct feveral veffels in which the monarch and his attendants might fail about the rivers and lakes in the vicinity of Mofco. By this practice he got in a fhort time fuch a tafte for the art of fhip-building and the whole fystem of marine, that he took a journey to Archangel in order to infpect the feveral fhips in that harbour, and to acquaint himfelf still farther with naval affairs. At Archangel he caufed a large vefiel to be built, was an attentive observer of the whole work as it proceeded, employed himfelf in making drawings and models of fhips, occafionally put his hand to the labour, and very often acted the part part of the steersman. It foon occurred to fuch a reflecting mind as Peter's, that a marine must be of fignal advantage to a country. He faw in the port of Archangel the influence of a haven on the trade, the commerce, and the whole bufinels of a nation; and all this accelerated the completion of the wifh he had already formed to have a navy. To incite his people to commerce, and thereby to diligence and activity by navigation, and by a fleet to increase the respect and the power of his empire, were the two plans, in the execution whereof he was now as feduloufly employed as in the better formation of his army. To the accomplishment of his defign, however, it was a great impediment that Ruffia had fo little water. The port of Archangel was adapted to the purpofes of commerce ; but it was not entirely fit for the uses of a navy, as the White-fea is fcarcely navigable fix months in the year, and Archangel is fituate at a great diftance from the reft of Europe: Peter was rather defirous to acquire water on the fide of the Euxine and the Cafpian, or in the parts of the Baltic, as more convenient for the fitting out of a fleet and offering greater opportunities for commerce. Both of these views in the fequel fucceeded.

The

The war between the Turks and the Pole: was not yet brought to a termination. Peter refolved, notwithstanding the unfuccessful campaign of Galitzin, to take once more a fhare in it, placing no fmall confidence at this time in the new regulations he had introduced into the army. Indeed he would have been able to accomplifh more, if in the first campaign he could have acted by fea; but the veffels which he caufed to be built for that purpole were not yet [1695] ready, and therefore all depended on this occasion on the land forces. To get poffeffion of Azof, then belonging to the Turks, and, as that fortrefs stands at the exit of the Don into the Euxine, to gain an intercourfe with that fea, was Peter's plan.

In this campaign he gave a good leffon to the nobility of the empire. The monarch declined to take upon him the chief command, chufing rather to ferve as a volunteer; though it would have been very eafy for him, even fuppofing him to have underftood but very little of military orders, to have acted as commander in chief by the advice of a council: intending by this to teach his nobles that talents and fkill are not innate, but muft be acquired; and therefore he appointed Gordon, Lefort, Scheremetof, and Schein commanders of his army, while he himfelf attended this this campaign as a pupil in the military art. However, the fuccels of the campaign was by no means brilliant; only the capture of a couple of forts before Azof: the affailants found it impoffible to take the citadel itfelf even by ftorm, and they were obliged to abandon the fiege. Peter, however, was not difheartened by this failure, but applied himfelf to repair the miltakes and neglects to which the ill-fuccefs of the campaign was owing, that he might proceed with fresh vigour to the accomplishment of his defign. That the whole army was divided into three corps independent on each other; that there was a great deficiency in artillery, and effectially in transport veffels; for preventing the Turks from fupplying the fortrefs with provisions from the water-fide, were the caufes which rendered ineffectual the first attack on Azof. Peter removed them all. He gave the chief command to Schein, obtained artillerifts and engineers from the emperor, from the elector of Brandenburg, and from the Dutch; and had likewife the fatisfaction of being now fupported in the fecond campaign [1696] by feveral tranfports, with the affiftance whereof he beat the Turks at fea, and thereby at length became mafter of Azof. This first victory of his partly new-conftituted army, and of his newly-acquired quired little fleet, he refolved to difplay before his people, whole affections he had captivated in the interim between the two campaigns, by his care in procuring a fupply of corn in a feafon of great fcarcity, in order thereby to rouze them from their inactivity, and to infpire them with confidence in the tzar's innovations, which in either respect could not be better done than by fhewing them their fruits. He accordingly appointed a triumphal procession into Mosco, fimilar to the triumphal entries of the ancient Romans; thus by publicly rewarding the foldiers for their bravery, he strove to quicken their fense of honour, and by this folemnity to raise in the breafts of the spectators a veneration for courage and intrepidity. Lefort, as admiral, and Schein as commander in chief of the land forces, were the principal perfonages in this triumphal procession, while Peter was lost without distinction in the crowd of officers, thus publicly fhewing his own greatness of mind and teftifying to the whole nation, for their encouragement to excel, that he would only recom--pense merit.

Immediately on his happy return from this fecond campaign, Peter employed his thoughts in forming plans for benefiting his empire by the vicinity of the Euxine thus forcibly ob-14 tained.

HISTORY OF RUSSIA.

tained. He refolved to conftruct a fleet in that fea; but, as his revenues alone were not fufficient for its equipment at once, he put out a proclamation commanding the patriarch and the other dignitaries of the church, the nobility, and merchants, to fhew their patriotifm by a pecuniary contribution for fitting out a certain number of fhips, while he himfelf engaged to get ready feveral others. Within three years the fleet was to be fit for fea, and therefore the work was immediately begun and continued with the utmoft expedition, as any omiffion of compliance with the orders in the decree was rigoroufly attended with heavy penalties.

As none other than foreign workmen, particularly Dutchmen and Italians, could be employed in the building and fitting out of these ships, Peter sent feveral young Russians, to qualify themselves for being their affistants afterwards, to Venice, Leghorn and Holland, to fludy the art of fhip-building there, and others to Germany to learn the fcience of war, as the german artillerifts and engineers had been of very great fervice to him at Azof. But, not content with merely prefcribing to others the way for acquiring feveral branches of knowledge beneficial to the nation, he came to the refolution to travel himfelf into foreign countries, to examine with VOL. II. F with his own eyes their feveral advantages, to propagate them in his empire, to transfufe more activity, industry, and diligence into the great mass of his subjects, and by that means to render his country more prosperous and powerful.

Shortly before this journey, however, Peter very narrowly efcaped being fent into another world, as a great number of his fubjects were highly diffatisfied with the various alterations that were going forward. Whatever he did was unlike to anything they had been accustomed to in the former tzars; nay, his behaviour in general was the very reverfe of theirs. The former tzars, for inftance, fhewed themfelves very rarely to the people, appearing only on particular folemnities in afiatic pomp and a cumberfome parade, to excite the awful admiration of a wondering populace, who gazed at them with the fame religious veneration with which they beheld the relics of their faints; and, having thus gratified their flavifh curiofity, returned in majeftic fate to the Kremlin, the tzarian palace at Mofco. - But Peter was every day to be feen, one while exercifing his troops, at another converfing in the public places, and then vifiting the workshops and private perfons. His whole behaviour therefore was extremely different from that that of the ancient tzars, and confequently numbers of Ruffians shook their heads at it. But likewife the regulations he introduced naturally excited difcontent, fince they were innovations; and even in enlightened countries as they are called, every innovation, however rational and profitable, is loudly enough decried to prevent us from being furprifed at the Ruffians of Peter's times for their not approving of his alterations. That Peter kept up a greater standing army - that he was conftantly limiting the power of the strelitzes - that he made no greater account of a nobleman than of a burgher - that he had many foreigners about him, whom he promoted and rewarded - that he himfelf ferved upwards in the army from the. lowest ranks - that he caufed a navy to be built, and compelled the clergy and others to open their coffers for the equipment of it that he fent a number of young Ruffians into heretical countries, even to Italy, the feat of the pope, the abomination of the Ruffians, though it had always been prohibited to travel out of the country - that, in fhort, he, the tzar himfelf, was determined to travel abroad, and probably at his return would pefter them with ftill more innovations : - all thefe circumstances feemed to a great part of the Ruffians fo entirely F 2

tirely out of rule, and fo utterly hoftile to alt their hereditary ufages, that murmurs began to be pretty plainly heard in feveral parts of the empire. Indeed they arofe merely from the ignorant and vulgar; for the more fenfible part of the nation very clearly perceived that the plans and regulations of the tzar were calculated for the lafting advantage of the country. Some malignants, however, conceived the horrible defign of firft murdering Peter, then maffacring the foreigners who had gained his effeem, and laftly, of fetching Sophia out of the convent and proclaiming her fovereign. But this plot was likewife happily defeated *, and Peter refcued.

The

* The circumftances of this plot to murder Peter are related in a very credible narrative in the following manner. A number of ftrelitzes, particularly exafperated at the reform of the troops and the employment of foreigners, had agreed to make away with the tzar. They met therefore one day at noon at the houfe of a strelitz, named Sukanin, the chief of the confpiracy, intending to remain there till about midnight, then to fet fire to a houfe adjacent to the tzar's palace, and when the tzar, according to his cultom, should appear to give directions about the means of stopping its progrefs, to affaffinate him in the crowd. But, two of these conspirators, being stung with remorfe previous to the execution of their plot, opened themfelves to each other, and obtained leave of the reft to go home and pafs in fleep the hours till midnight that they might be the more more alert for their purpofe at that time. Inftead, however, of doing as they proposed, they repaired to Peter, and difclofed to him the whole of the horrid defign. Peter immediately wrote to the captain of one of the regiments of guards, commanding him to inveft Sukanin's houfe in perfect filence at ten o'clock. In his hurry he wrote eleven instead of ten. He himself proceeded, just after ten, to the neighbourhood of the house, in the expectation of finding all in readinefs; but was much furprifed at not feeing the guard. Hearing a great noife in the houfe, he even ventured in, and fuddenly found himfelf in the midft of his fworn enemies. Inflead of being ftruck with awe at his prefence, they thought this the luckiest opportunity for making fure of their purpofe. He defired that he might not interrupt them at their mirth, fat down and drank with them, and fhewed himfelf in high fpirits. The confpirators drank boldly to him, and were giving one another the wink to fall upon him, when the captain of the guard, who had furrounded the house in perfect filence, entered the room with fome of his people, refcued Peter, and arrefted the confpirators, who were afterwards cruelly put to death. Peter, in a paffion, gave the captain a box on the ear for coming too late. But he produced the tzar's order in which eleven o'clock was plainly written. Peter immediately kiffed him on the forehead, and declared him blamelefs.

It

It would lead me too far from my purpole were I to accompany Peter on his journey, and to defcribe everything remarkable in this extraordinary man. That belongs rather to his biographer. My province extends only to those transactions which had an influence on his empire. Lefort and a few other perfons travelling under the name of a ruffian embaffy to feveral european courts, he went incognito in their train, through Riga and Kœnigfberg, to Holland, England, thence back to Holland, and by Drefden to Vienna. His abfence awakened in the breaft of Sophia - who had perhaps been implicated in the plot just related against Peter's life - the defire of profecuting afresh her old plan, to which indeed the journey of the tzar feemed to afford a convenient opportunity.

The ftrelitzes were now again to affift Sophia in the accomplifhment of her project. In the double election that had been made [1697] of a king of Poland, one party having chosen the french prince de Conti, and the other the elector of Saxony, Frederic Augustus, Peter declared himfelf on the fide of Augustus, and in Holland figned an edict, by which a body of his troops, chiefly strelitzes, were ordered to march to the polish frontiers, to be ready in cafe of necessity to to support Augustus against the opposite party. But this very body fuffered itfelf to be inveigled into Sophia's prefent attempt to feize upon the throne, though the horrid punifhments which had been inflicted on the late rebels were fo recent. Under pretence that Peter had died abroad, and that they must go back to Mosco to deliver the throne to the young Alexey Petrovitch, these strelitzes quitted their camp, degraded feveral of their officers, who would not turn about with them, made choice of others from their own body, and took the road to the capital. Those troops, however, which were ftationed in and about Mofco, and were moftly foreigners, marched by command of the regency against the rebellious strelitzes. Gordon, who was at the head of thefe troops, first had recourfe to gentle methods. But these failing, and the strelitzes finding great concurrence, numbers even of the clergy uniting with them, from their hatred to Peter as the friend of foreign heretics, Gordon attacked the rebels in form, beat them, and kept them in cuftody till Peter's return. On the arrival of the tzar he inflicted dreadful punishments on the ringleaders, drafted the other strelitzes into different regiments, abolished that appellation, gave all his troops the name of foldiers, and took two particular F 4

ticular regiments for his body-guard. Thus ended Sophia's last enterprife to deprive Peter of the crown [1698]. Gibbets were erected in front of her convent, and numbers of the strelitzes hung upon them. Even the tzar's confort was thought to have had a hand in this attempt. Peter banished her likewise to the cloisster, and his affection for prince Alexey, whom she had borne to him, now evidently diminished from day to day.

On his journey homewards from Vienna, Peter had a conference in Rava with Auguftus king of Poland. Here they bound themfelves to a common participation in a war againft Sweden, which accordingly foon after broke out. A war, which proved of no fervice to Auguftus and the republic of Poland, which rather deprived the former of his crown for a time, coft his Saxons much blood and treafure, ravaged and depopulated Poland, from which at laft Peter alone derived very confiderable advantages ; nay which gave to all Ruffia a very different form, connected it more intimately with the reft of Europe, and procured it a greater influence on the other european powers.

Charles XI. king of Sweden died in 1697, and his fon Charles XII. not yet fixteen years old, afcended the throne. The king of Denmark, mark, Frederic IV. Augustus king of Poland, and tzar Peter, were all three determined to take advantage of the youth and inexperience of Charles XII. Peter had views upon Ingria, Effhonia, and the Baltic, Augustus on Livonia, and Frederic upon Holftein, which belonged to the brother-in-law of the young monarch. Charles, who in his earlier years had given frequent proofs of an uncomplying temper, on hearing of the schemes of his enemies, discovered the most determined resolution to resist force by force, became now entirely a foldier, and was, for almost nine years fuccessively the most fuccessful hero of his time. In march 1700 Denmark opened the war by an invafion of the territories of the duke of Holstein, and fo foon after as the month of August was obliged to make peace with Charles. This prince now turned his arms against his fecond enemy, the king of Poland, and victory accompanied them everywhere. Augustus had hoped to find adherents in Livonia, where he had made an incurfion, as the inhabitants were by no means fatisfied with the fwedifh government; but the Livonians ftood in awe of the victorious Charles, retained their fealty to the fwedish government, and Augustus was unable to maintain his ground in Livonia.

In the meantime Peter had no fooner concluded an armiftice for thirty years with the Turks, 1699, than he alfo took part in the war against Charles; and, in 1700, penetrating into Ingria, laid fiege to the citadel of Narva. The ruffian army was very numerous, and though it might not, as has been affirmed, confift of 80,000, yet it certainly amounted to at least 40,000 men. But among them were only a few well-difciplined regiments, in the whole perhaps 12,000 men, the reft of the troops being nobility fummoned to attend with their retinue. Add to this the unfortunate jealoufy and diffentions among the commanders. " Peter's prefence indeed kept them under some restraint; but, on his departure for the purpole of raifing more troops in the territories of Pfcove and Novgorod, all union was diffolved, and Charles, who appeared with 8000 men, mostly cavalry, on the 30th of November 1700, entirely routed the great ruffian army, which in numbers four or five times exceeded his own. Ere Peter could come with his reinforcements to Narva, he already received an account of the unfuccefsful event of the fiege by the total defeat of his army. Charles, moreover, had fuch a thorough contempt for the ruffian foldiers, that he would not even detain the privates he had taken prifoners, but but fent them home. If the fortunate hero had now followed up his conquefts; had he purfued the flying Ruffians to the heart of the country, Peter would certainly have had enough to do to make an adequate refiftance to fuch an enemy; and what Charles afterwards in vain propofed, namely to dictate terms of peace to Peter in Mofco, he might now probably have effected, as the dread of him and his foldiers, who were held in Ruffia for fupernatural men or necromancers, would have prepared the way for him.

But the youthful conqueror at Narva refolved first to humble Augustus, to deprive him of his crown, and then to attack Peter, and as he confidently expected compel him to fubmit. " If I remain fifty years in Poland, I will not " quit it till I have driven the king from the " throne." Such was his arrogant declaration, to which he inflexibly adhered; for he was undoubtedly the most conceited man that ever fat upon a throne, and never would listen to the advice of his counfellors : a conceitedness which turned greatly to the advantage of Peter and of Ruffia.

Charles, in the meantime, utterly regardlefs of Peter, and defpifing the Ruflians, marched againft Poland, in order to execute his favourite plan, the dethroning of Augustus; and thus gave Peter

Peter time to recruit his armies, to recover from the difaster he had fustained, and with new forces to diffrcfs Charles, who was penetrating into foreign countries, in the interior of his own. As all the artillery at Narva, about 150 pieces of cannon, had fallen into the hands of the Swedes. Peter had now recourfe to the fame means for cafting more, which in our time have been employed by the French. He caufed the fuperfluous bells of the churches and monasteries to be melted : and to refute the fuperflitious notion that this was a profanation of the facred metal by an argument of a like nature, he declared that it was only this holy metal that could be of any fervice against the fwedish magicians. In order to augment his army he proclaimed all vaffals to be free who fhould enlift. In a fhort time he had again cannon enough, and withal a very numerous army which he was ever feduloufly employed in improving in order and difcipline. He renewed his alliance with Augustus at Brisen, in 1701. He exerted his endeavours to draw over the republic of Poland to him and his ally : but found it an extremely difficult undertaking, as even at that time the fpirit of party prevailed generally in Poland, which in more recent times has brought fuch misfortunes on that country. It was given out by the adverfaries of Augustus,

Auguflus, who abounded in numbers, that by invading Livonia without the confent of the republic, and thereby declaring war against the king of Sweden, by forming an alliance with the tzar, and by keeping faxon troops about him. he had violated the conftitution of the country, and they became very clamorous for a peace with Sweden. To this Augustus and his party would not confent, attempted to block up all entrance into Poland against the Swedes, placing their reliance on being fupported by Peter with men and money, and ftrained every nerve to move the flates, affembled in a diet, to a declaration of war against Charles. But in vain. No unanimity could be effected *. Charles had already

* That Poland would be gradually on the decline, and at length, as the hiftory of our own times has evinced, entirely vanifh from the rank of governments, might have been even then forefeen, as fo little genuine patriotifm was prevalent among the great. Every one of them was attentive only to his private intereft, and, according as he faw the balance to incline, was ever going over from one party to the other. Johann Reinhold von Patkul, a livonian nobleman, who, with fome others, was fent in the name of the livonian nobility to Charles XI. king of Sweden, at that time fovereign of Livonia, to reprefent to him the grievances of the livonian nobility, and to implore relief, but, inflead of receiving an anfwer, was arefled and taken into cuftody, afterwards found an opportunity to efcape out of prifon, entered thereupon already a great many friends and adherents, who only waited for his appearance in the country to declare on his fide.

Favoured, therefore, by the opponents of Augustus, and the irrefolution of the Poles in the fupport of their prince, he pushed farther and upon into the fervice of Peter, was by him appointed ambaffador to king Augustus, and in that station was obliged to have much intercourfe with the principal Poles, gave fuch a defeription in his accounts to the tzar of the then great men of Poland, that it is eafily difcoverable, that those things must befall that country which have fince befallen it. as the patriotifm and defence of liberty, of which they were ever talking, were fo many idle words, and everything was to be had for money. Here follow fome paffages from this Patkul's letters : " Mere unfubstantiated words are not here of " much avail; the Poles pay more regard to the hands than " to the mouth ; whoever has anything to do with them, will " find that miracles are performed among them with ready " money."-" A principal man of quality has given me to " underfland, that if prefents were to be made to the com-" mander and the treafurer (who were in oppolition to king " Augustus,) of 15,000 ducats each, and a yearly pension " of 5000 ducats, all thefe affairs would be prefently " brought to a conclusion."-" No dependance is to be " made on the Poles: they are to-day for the Swedes, to-" morrow good royalifts, and the day after know not them-" felves what they are."-" Of the Poles nothing is to be " expected but words."-" No reliance is to be made on " the republic to the force of a hair," &c.

farther, advanced through Courland and Lithuania to Poland, and put in execution his plan of dethroning Augustus, caufed Stanislaus Lefchinfky, voivode of Pofen, to be elected king, proceeded from Poland to Saxony, and thence turned back to Poland, in order now, after vanquifhing his fecond enemy, Augustus, to compel the third, Peter, to a humiliating and difadvantageous peace in Molco. But for this Charles had loft the proper moment; for while he had been humbling and dethroning Augustus, in which he confumed feveral years, the formerly unpractifed ruffian troops, were learning to make an effectual stand against the Swedes, had even formed themfelves, by the very war with that exercifed and valiant people, into hardy and veteran foldiers, and had gradually made themfelves masters of a part of the fwedish possessions on the Baltic.

That Peter, as on the first unfuccefsful campaign against the Turks was not dispirited, neither gave up all for lost in confequence of the unfortunate battle near Narva, I have already mentioned: his first object was to repair his losses, and to remedy his defects, in hopes that his troops, among whom he had always admitted and still continued to admit many foreigners, would one day learn to overcome the Swedes, 6 though though for the prefent they might be beaten by them, and probably by repeated ftruggles with them as well trained troops, difcover the way to victory. It was not long before his expectations were fully juftified.

As it was very eafy for the Swedes to proceed from Narva across the Peipus lake into the territory of Novgorod, for preventing this, Peter caufed a number of fchooners to be built on that and the Ladoga lake, on one hand to refift the Swedes in cafe they fhould attempt a landing, and at the fame time to annoy Livonia, Efthonia, and Ingria, as occasion might require, by the debarkation of his own troops. Accordingly, frequent battles were fought in these parts between the Ruffians and the Swedes, both by water and by land; and, though the Swedes were generally the conquerors, yet it fometimes happened that the Ruffians had the advantage; and even on those occasions when the Swedes were victorious, the ruffian troops were at least gaining experience, and gradually becoming more expert in military affairs, and forming themfelves from day to day into good foldiers. Indeed it was unpardonable in Charles to remain fo totally unconcerned about the vifible progrefs of the Ruffians, and fo confident in the expectation that they would always continue to be the fame fame Ruffians that they were before Narva, and be everywhere as eafily beaten as at that place.

Peter was every day deriving advantage from Charles's negligence and fcorn. He took Marienburg, and Nœteburg an exceedingly ftrong fortress on the Ladoga lake, was now master of the Neva which flows into the Baltic, and was in a capacity therefore to fee his wifh fulfilled of having poffeffions adjacent to the fea, if he might prefume to hope that he could maintain the. conquered country against its old posseffor. Another triumphal entry into Mosco rewarded the courage of the troops both by fea and land, while Charles thought the conquests that had been made not of any concern. Peter redoubled his affiduity in the construction of ships to be employed on the lakes Peipus, Ladoga, and Onega. In 1703 he captured Nyenfchantz, a fortrefs at the mouth of the Neva; and, in the neighbourhood of that citadel, in a region conquered from the enemy, the calm possession whereof was by no means certain, but was still extremely liable to the verfatile fortune of war, laid the foundation of ST. PETERSBURG. The Swedes were at first careless spectators of the founding and building of a city, which, from the marshiness of its soil, they thought could never be brought to effect; but Peter removed or fur-VOL. II. mounted G mounted all difficulties, and a fortrefs was foon crected covered by another fort on an ifland, Kronschlot. To establish a commerce by means of the contiguous Baltic, and thus to procure for his empire a more extended reciprocal intercourfe with other european countries was Peter's main object in building Petersburg; and fcarcely were the foundations laid, when a merchant-fhip from Amfterdam arrived in its harbour. Peter rewarded it richly. This first was foon followed by others. Thus had Peter knit a new tie between his empire and the reft of Europe. By an ever vigilant and active attention to all the enterprifes of Sweden, who indeed now gradually but too well perceived how dangerous Peter's views might prove to her, he frustrated her attempts to deftroy this new colony, employed the fortreffes he had raifed in these parts in continually making fresh acquisitions from the enemy, already in 1704 conquered Dorpat and Narva, and was now mafter of Ingria, over which he appointed prince Mentchikof, his favourite, to be viceroy, with orders to make the farther building of Petersburg his principal concern, where not only ftructures were rifing in every quarter, but alfo navigation and commerce were increasing in vigour and extent.

In

In the meantime Peter continued to affift his ally Augustus with men and money; and had not the latter been fo totally neglected by the polifh nation, had he on this occasion only met with fomewhat more fidelity, it is highly probable that he would have been able to hold out against Charles, and not been obliged to fubmit to fuch hard conditions at the peace of Altranstadt in 1706. Ere this was concluded, with which Peter, however, was not fatisfied, the tzar's troops had penetrated into Lithuania; but they could do nothing for Augustus, and it moreover ufually happened, that wherever Sweden and Ruffia fought in the open plain, the latter fubmitted, and were forced to leave the field to the former as victors. In October 1706, the united Ruffians and Saxons on one fide, and the Swedes on the other, came indeed to an engagement, in which the latter were defeated; but then the accommodation between Augustus and Charles was already in train, and the latter fought only as it were by compulsion against the troops of a monarch, with whom he had even begun to negotiate. The victory, therefore, was not followed up to any advantage. However, though Peter's troops and money were found inadequate to keep Augustus on the throne, the ruffian ruffian arms were more and more fuccefsful on the fhores of the Baltic, where Peter was making a rapid, and for Ruffia an advantageous progrefs.

At length, when Charles in 1706 faw his wifh fulfilled, by having forced Augustus to renounce the polifh crown, he thought it the moft important ftep he could take, to march with his army, now well recruited and provisioned, out of Saxony directly to Ruffia, for the purpole of forcing [1707] Peter likewife in his turn to a peace, as he had acted before with Frederic and Augultus. His nearest way for penetrating into the heart of Ruffia, lay through Poland and Li-Peter, who was flationed at Grodno thuania. in Lithuania, abandoned that city in hafte on the approach of Charles; and it appeared as though the Ruffians were able to bid defiance to the troops of that prince, fo long as he himfelf was not at their head; but, when led on by their king in perfon, would give no proof of valour, and would be as eafily vanguished by him as formerly before Narva. Peter indeed endeavoured to flop Charles from piercing farther into Lithuania, by which country his own was covered, and the ruffian troops difputed all the posts with the fwedish foldiers; but Charles everywhere drove them back, forced them from all all their entrenchments *, and opened to himfelf a way into Peter's provinces. Five hundred miles he had yet to Mofco. Certainly not too tirefome a march for him and his army, who had come the much longer road from Sweden to Saxony; efpecially as, Smolenfk excepted, only few places of any confequence flood in their way. But the borders of Ruffia feemed at the fame time to be the boundary of that military fuccefs which had hitherto accompanied Charles; and the failure of a plot concerted with that prince, not only refcued Peter, but procured him alfo a complete victory over his antagonift.

Mazeppa, hetman of the kozaks, was not welldifpofed to Peter. He owed his dignity to prince Galitzin who had been banished by the tzar; and now entered into a negotiation with Charles. Induced to this either by a fort of gratitude towards his old patron, or by the hope of rendering himfelf, under the auspices of the fortunate Charles, fovereign of the kozaks and independent on Russia, or even from the apprehension that, amidst fo many reformations, * Thus it was at the battle of Holovtzin, in July 1708, where the Ruffians, notwithftanding their advantageous position, and their brave refistance, were obliged to fubmit to the Swedes.

Peter

Peter might also think of reforming the conftitution of the kozaks; he therefore might probably refolve to prevent him, by contributing what he could to weaken this enterprising tzar. Whatever was the caufe, thus much is certain, that Mazeppa invited Charles to pufh farther down to the fouth, where he would go over to him with his numerous kozaks, reprefenting to Charles that he would afterwards have a much eafier march from the Ukraine to Mofco, as the kozaks would join him and fupply him with provifions, which indeed were with great difficulty to be obtained in Poland, ravaged and defolated as that country was by Swedes and Ruffians, and the two parties of Augustus and of Staniflaus. Charles found this propofal fo agreeable, that, in opposition to the advice of his counfellor, count Piper, he turned out of the strait road to Ruffia, and proceeded to the Ukraine. At the river Defna, Mazeppa had engaged to meet him with his people. The Ruffians difputed with Charles the passage over this river; however, he furmounted even that obstacle. But, waiting here for Mazeppa's confiderable body of auxiliaries, and their fupplies, which he was no lefs in want of, he found himfelf miferably deceived. Mazeppa had promifed far more than he was able now to perform ; not quite five thousand kozaks went went over with him to the Swedes, the reft retained their allegiance to Ruffia; and to add to the disappointment of Charles, a russian corps had attacked and carried off the greater part of the provisions deftined for the Swedes *. Fortunately, as Peter had defeated Mazeppa's plan, and reduced him to a very infignificant ally of Charles, he was foon after not lefs fuccefsful in depriving that prince of another needful affiftance, by entirely defeating the Swedish general Lœvenhaupt, who had been ordered to him by his king, not only to ftrengthen the army by his corps, but to convoy with him a great quantity of provisions and ammunition from Livonia; fo that all the ftores fell into Peter's hands; and of the 15,000 men of which Lævenhaupt's army confifted, fcarcely 6000 came to Charles t. The fituation of that monarch now became every day more critical. His army was rapidly wafting away, numbers of his people were carried off by the frost, and the fcarcity of provifions admitted of no remedy : yet he obstinately * Mazeppa was afterwards proclaimed an outlaw, and hung in effigy.

† Three days fucceflively was this corps fix times attacked by the Ruffians, far fuperior to it in numbers, and yet refufed to fubmit, but cut their way, fword in hand, to Charles.

perfifted in his plan of fubjecting the Ukraine to him, and thence of proceeding to Mofco. The inclemency of the weather had just fufficiently fubfided for allowing him to act when he broke up his camp to lay fiege to Pultava, a ftrong place in the Ukraine, where the Ruffians had feveral magazines. Peter, who now commanded in perfon, conducted himfelf like an able general, and likewife difplayed great intrepidity. He had not been idle; had always accurately watched his enemy, placed the frontiers of his empire and the road to Mofco, in a good flate of defence, and arrived now with a numerous army likewife at Pultava, where he gained fo complete a victory over Charles, that he was obliged to fave himfelf by flight. In this battle, the 8th of July 1709, the whole fwedish army was either destroyed or taken prisoners; only a very finall part of it escaping with the king to Turkey. This battle was certainly one of the most decifive that was ever fought. On it depended not only the fates of Peter, Charles, and Augustus, but those of Ruffia, Sweden, and Poland entirely refted on the iffue of a battle between two armies, who both fought with bravery and true courage, and were fenfible to the high prize that awaited the victory on one fide or the other. Fortune declared for Peter. And in confequence of his being conqueror at Pultava, Pultava, all farther dread of Charles was put to flight, which had indeed been lately fomewhat leffened by the latter's not proceeding directly from Lithuania to Ruffia; the Ukraine, of which Peter had greatly to apprehend the lofs, was again free; the affairs of Augustus began to revive; he and Peter might now hope to increafe their influence on the Poles, on having reduced Charles, whom they dreaded, to a fituation in which he could do no harm; Peter's new possessions on the Baltic, for the prefervation whereof he must hitherto have been under great apprehenfions, his darling Peterfburg, his conquered Ingria, feemed now entirely fecured; he could now act more unmolested, and profecute without impediment the reformations he had begun to make in his empire. Peter had been witnefs that his troops, in the eight years that had elapfed fince Charles beat them before Narva, had very much improved; that they had fhewn themfelves uncommonly brave and welldifciplined, and highly merited the triumphal entry into Mofeo which he had now decreed. On no former occafion of triumph likewife had the Ruffians reafon for fo great rejoicings as on the prefent, as they had been in dread and danger left Charles might have made an hoftile entrance by that very gate through which their tzar 1 0 1 F 1 and terms a li tzar now proceeded in triumph as victor of the warlike fwedifh king, and conducted the vanquifhed Swedes as witneffes of his glory *.

Auguftus immediately profited by Charles's defeat, appeared again in Poland, reconciled himfelf at Thorn, in October 1709, with Peter, who, though he had not approved of the peace of Altranftadt, and, much as Charles had formerly fupported his newly-elected Staniflaus, fo much was Peter labouring to maintain Auguftus now once more as it were feated on the throne. Denmark likewife again now publicly declared againft Charles, and even Pruflia combined with Peter and Auguftus in oppofition to the hero who had been unfortunate at Pultava. In the meantime, as Peter had fuccefsfully enforced the claims of his predeceffors on Ingria, he now ftrove to fubject to him likewife Karelia, Livo-

* On the day of the battle, about 9 in the evening Peter wrote to admiral Apraxin at Mofco: "Very early this "morning the furious enemy attacked our cavalry with "all his horfe and foot; and, though they fought as "bravely as could be expected, yet they were forced to "retreat with great lofs. However, in one word, the "whole hoftile army has come to an end like Phaeton. "But what is become of the king we are not able to dif-"cover, whether he be with us or with the enemy. — "Now, by God's affifance, the foundation flone for the building "of Peterfburg is indeed completely laid."

nia, and Efthonia, upon which countries the tzar had earlier exhibited his pretenfions; and his meafures here alfo fucceeded. The fortifications of Vyborg, Riga, and Reval, the capital cities and principal places of Karelia, Livonia, and Efthonia, together with Kexholm and the ifle of Œfel, were already in Peter's poffeffion before the termination of the year 1710, and he was therefore mafter of the principal ports of the Baltic. — Peter likewife took part in the enterprifes againft the poffeffions of Charles in Pomerania, and againft the territory of the dukes of Holftein.

But, however great the advantage which the victory at Pultava had procured to the whole ruffian empire, and however Peter had profited, by it that fame year, as I have juft been relating, yet, fo foon after as 1711 (therefore only two years from that fortunate event) he was in danger of lofing all that he had gained, and of feeing the fruits of his undeniably great exertions and his unwearied activity at once ravifhed from him.

It was not very difficult for Charles to raife an intereft in his behalf in the divan of the fultan of Conftantinople. They had heard of his exploits, and ftill regarded him as a great hero. That this hero was now unfortunate could could not leffen the veneration in which he was held; befides, it was the tzar of Ruffia who had fo totally defeated Charles, to whom the Turks, but a few years ago, had been forced to furrender Azof, a mortification which they knew not how to forgive: It did not indeed at first appear that the porte intended to take an active part in the contest between the two fovereigns, as in 1710 they renewed the armiftice with Ruffia. But Charles was enabled by his different and active friend Poniatofiky, (the father of the late king of Poland,) to increase his influence in the divan, and even to procure the difgrace of two fucceflive grand vizirs, who gave their advice against the war with Russia, and at length attained his aim in the hoftile meafures now begun to be adopted by the porte against Peter. Peter, who now faw himfelf fuddenly menaced by an unexpected enemy, had recourse to the means of defence ; but, by advancing against the Turks, committed the fame faults which had proved fo difastrous to Charles. As Charles had shewna contempt for the Ruffians for which he paid fo dearly at Pultava, fo Peter contemned the Turks. - Charles placing reliance on Mazeppa, and allured by his promifes, marched to his great misfortune into the Ukraine; Peter, becaufe Cantemir, the hofpodar of Moldavia, a vaffal vaffal of the porte, promifed him his fupport, marched alfo too far into the enemy's country, quite to Yaffy in Moldavia, where he foon experienced a want of provisions, as Charles had done; nay, he faw himfelf at length fo furrounded by the Turks, on the river Pruth, not far from Yaffy; that only three ways were open for his efcape, each more horrible than the other. - Either he and his people must perish with hunger, fince on one fide he was encompaffed by the turkish camp, and on the other by the tartarian, fo that abfolutely no * provisions of any kind could be conveyed to him, or he must furrender, or attempt to cut his way through the enemy, which in his circumstances indeed feemed an impoffibility, as he had at most little more than twenty thousand men, whereas the camp of his enemy contained upwards of two hundred thousand foldiers. Peter, reduced to defperation, fat in his tent, reprefenting in his troubled mind all his labours at once deftroyed, all his hopes defeated, and thought himfelf at that moment more unfortunate than Charles was at Pultava. - In the

* The Ruffians could not even provide themfelves with water from the adjacent river Pruth, as the Turks were enabled by their fituation to fire upon them whenever they approached the water-fide.

midst of this distress, his confort Catharine fuggefted to him that nothing prevented his afking peace of the grand vizir; and, in order to obtain a gracious reception of him, to accompany the meffage with confiderable prefents; perhaps a voluntary propofal of an accommodation might be preferable in the vizir's mind to any hopes arifing from the uncertain iffue of a battle. The project fucceeded beyond expectation. All the valuables, all the money that could be fpared, were got together, propofals were made to the grand vizir, offers were made of fome facrifices, the diffreffing fituation was indeed as much as poffible concealed, much was faid of courage and intrepidity, of cutting a paffage through the Turks, and, in confideration of the abandonment of Azof, the razure of the newbuilt Taganrok, and the promife of quitting-Poland, the tzar obtained a peace of the grand vizir, who refolved not to ftake on the event of a battle the certain advantage which he had procured for his country in the peace, as the Ruffians only the day before had given proofs of their valour, and he was not without apprehenfions that a fmall army fighting defperately might even contend to advantage against fuperior numbers.

No

No wonder that Poniatoffky, Charles's friend, who was with the vizir in his tent, endeavoured by the most instant remonstrances to diffuade him from this peace; no wonder that Charles, who came into the turkish camp foon after it was figned, raved and ftormed like a madman; knowing as they did that it was in the vizir's power to have entirely ruined Peter, or at leaft to have dictated to him fuch terms of accommodation as would have been of effential advantage to Charles : whereas he had fcarcely done anything for him *. - However, as Peter was conftantly finding reasons for deferring his evacuation of Poland, and thereby feemed not inclined to fulfil the articles of the treaty, it was eafy for Charles again to inflame the refentment of the fultan. Accordingly twice did the Ruffians and Turks appear to be again on the point of coming to a rupture; but Peter both times had the art of appealing the porte, and to prevent it from far-

* Upon this Charles did not reft till this vizir, who had been fo regardlefs of his interefts, was depofed from his office and fent into banifhment. All that appeared concerning Charles in the treaty was: " as the king of Sweden " has put himfelf under the protection of the porte, his " tzarian majefty promifes, out of friendship, to allow him " a free and fafe return to his country, and to conclude a " peace with him — if the terms can be agreed on."

ther espousing the part of Charles. [1712, 1713.] The Porte and Russia therefore continued to be friends, and Peter was every day carrying his arms farther into the country of the defeated monarch. Helsingœrs and Abo, and by them almost all Finland, as well as the isle of Aland, fell, 1713, into Peter's hands; and fears were entertained in the capital and refidence of Sweden, where the fovereign had not been for many years seen, of witnessing the victorious entry of the monarch of the neighbouring empire.

But the great fucceffes of Peter, alarms arifing from the prodigious increase of his territory, and jealoufy at the rapid progrefs it was making in arts as well as arms, indifposed to him the powers confederated with him against Charles, fo that, under the guidance of Geertz, a negotiation was even entered into between him and the fwedifh monarch, which however, was interrupted by the death of the latter after his return from Turkey; who, though once more victorious in Norway, was flain before Frederichshal in 1718. The new fwedish government, to whom Peter applied for the termination of the negotiation that had been fet on foot, were encouraged to hope, by the aid of Great Britain, to bring him to a compliance with their terms, and

and in two campaigns he employed the time afforded him by the tediousness of the english fleet, in committing horrible devastations on the fwedish coast *. His intention was to extort a peace; but Sweden obstinately held out till 1721, in which year on the 10th of September at Nystadt in Finland, a peace was brought to effect, by which the dreadful ftruggle for eighteen years between two fovereigns, and the war of one-and-twenty years between two neighbouring nations were happily brought to an end. The fwedifh government was on this occafion obliged to fubfcribe to the following hard condition : Sweden cedes to Ruffia, LIVONIA, Es-THONIA, INGRIA, A PART OF KARELIA, WITH THE TERRITORY OF VYBORG, THE ISLE OF ŒSEL, AND ALL OTHER ISLANDS IN THE SOUTHERN SEA AND THE BALTIC, FROM KUR-

Major-general Lacy laid wafte 2 towns, 21 noblemen's feats, 535 farms, 40 mills, 16 magazines, and 9 iron-works, whereof one was of fo great value that the proprietors offered 300,000 dollars to preferve it — but in vain. The Ruffians deflroyed not only what was upon the earth, but even what was under it ; they ruined feveral iron and copper mines for ever.

On occasion of this peace fo glorious to the empire, grand feflivities were appointed throughout all Ruffia, and the fenate and the fynod offered Peter, the conqueror of the Baltic, in behalf of his nation, to exchange the title of tzar for that of LMPEROR AND AUTOCRATOR OF ALL THE RUSSIAS, and to permit himfelf in future to be ftyled, FATHER OF THE COUN-TRY. To thefe appellations were added the honourable furname, THE GREAT.

But it was not merely on account of the conquefts that Peter had made, that he obtained from his country the furname of THE GREAT, and which pofterity has confirmed; he acquired that glorious epithet by more important exploits; it was conferred upon him as due to his merits in regard to the numerous and various inftitutions, enterprifes, and regulations, which, even during this long war, amidst the din of arms, he planned and executed, with a diligence which has never been equalled by any fovereign in modern times, and which he intended, to the utmost of his inclination and ability, to be beneficial to his empire, and to the civilization and improvement of his people. But these his great and undeniable merits run fo like a tiffue through the war of twenty years, that I thought it most advisable to confine myself here entirely to the uninterrupted hiftory of that war, which was of fuch confequence to the empire at large *, and to reprefent the progrefs of the ruffian nation in improvements of every kind, for the fake of its eafier furvey, in a connected reprefentation afterwards. I therefore now proceed in the narrative of what relates to the extension and aggrandizement of the empire from without.

Shortly after the peace concluded with Sweden, which gave an entirely different afpect not only to the ruffian empire, but to the whole north of Europe, and by which Ruffia was con-

fiderably augmented, Peter had an opportunity for enlarging the borders of his empire likewife Several diffurbances had towards the fouth. arifen in Perfia fo long fince as 1709; and among others, at the capture of the perfian town Schamachy in 1712, a number of ruffian merchants were partly killed, and partly defpoiled of their property. Peter, in 1715, entered into a new treaty of commerce with the shah of Persia, and promifed him at the fame time affiftance against the rebels. He afterwards took fuch advantage of favourable circumftances as to make it eafy for him to gain the dominion of the Cafpian, by marching into Perfia in 1722, in order, as he declared in his manifesto, to protect the fhah, who in fact was much reduced by repeated exertions; but at the fame time to chastife the rebels who had behaved fo injurioufly to the ruffian fubjects. He arrived with his army at Derbent, and made himfelf mafter of that city. Peter's new fucceffes foon rouzed the attention of the Porte; and, alarmed at this progrefs in the adjoining country of Perfia, threatened him with a war. However, the two powers came to an agreement by a treaty fimilar to that which in our times was entered into by Ruffia, Auftria, and Pruffia on the partition of Poland; and in virtue whereof the porte appro-7* priated priated to itfelf a part of Perfia, Peter obtained feveral provinces, and the reft of the country remained to the fhah. It was naturally to be fuppofed that the laft did not heartily concur in this partition; as the fequel indeed confirmed. Befides, the inhabitants of the provinces occupied by the Turks and Ruffians looked upon thefe pretended patrons as enemies; and it coft Peter a great number of men, and, by reafon of the diftance of Ruffia, much money, to maintain himfelf in poffeffion of the five diftricts that had been allotted to him.

- In the very year, however, when this partition was effected, 1725, Peter died; and his fecond confort CATHARINE afcended the throne.

Peter, when no more than in his feventeenth year had married Eudokhia Lapukhin. But the character of that lady was too opposite to his own to allow of any lafting union. Eudokhia was descended from a very ancient ruffian family; and, imbued with the prejudices of her country, and rank, could find no fatisfaction in Peter's more liberal way of thinking in regard to religious ceremonies, his contempt for the clergy, his innovations, and his intercourfe with foreigners, but made him frequent reproaches for his illicit amours, and created in him a diflike to her, which she seemed rather disposed to foster H 3 than than to remove. Add to this, that Peter's favourites, who were often from the loweft orders, were flighted by her, and therefore took their revenge by alienating the tzar's affection from her; and, at length, after he had repudiated her, even made her fuspected by him of keeping'a correspondence with his enemies. This drew upon her the hard lot of being banished to a convent [1698]. On the fubsequent condemnation of her fon, in whose criminal transactions, it was pretended, but never proved, that the took part, Peter fent her to another convent, where she was doomed to live, like a prifoner, on hard diet, till she was afterwards fet at liberty by her grandson Peter II.

Peter's early averfion to Eudokhia had a moft pernicious influence on Alexey, the fon fhe bore him in 1690, and was the ground of the deplorable feries of forrows which befel that prince. The diffentions between the father and the mother fpeedily diminifhed the father's affection for Alexey. Peter's vaft and comprehenfive plans, his campaigns, his concerns, entirely confined to the reformation and improvement of the empire, with his various journies to the remote parts of his dominions, prevented him from paying much attention to the education of his fon. Alexey at first grew up under female tuition, tuition, and then fell into the hands of fome of the clergy; who, with most of the members of the fpiritual order in Ruffia; were diffatisfied with Peter's reforms, with his toleration, and his notion of ecclefiaftical authority, which, though juft, was by no means agreeable to that body, and they therefore hoped to educate this fon as a future pillar of the church. Under their guidance the prince imbibed prejudices in abundance, and daily conceived a greater abhorrence for his father. This being observed by Peter, he put an end to the fpiritual education, and appointed Mentchikof chief preceptor of the prince, a man who himfelf had never received the flighteft education, but by his attachment to the tzar had acquired his favour. Mentchikof was not fond of Alexey, and the latter had been early infpired by the mother with contempt and averfion for the favourite of his father. The tutors, who were now placed about the prince, were not able to eradicate the prejudices impreffed on his mind from his infancy, and now grown inveterate; befides, he had an unconquerable diflike to them as foreigners. The future fovereign of fo vaft an empire, that was now reformed in all its parts, and by profperous wars still farther enlarged ; the heir of a throne, whole poffeffor ruled over many millions of people, H4 people, had been brought up from his birth as if defigned for a ruffian bifhop; theology continued to be his favourite fludy : with a capacity for those fciences which are useful in government, he discovered no inclination to them. Moreover he addicted himfelf early in life to drunkennels and other exceffes. There were not wanting fuch as flattered his perverfe dispositions, by reprefenting to him that the ruffian nation was diffatisfied with his father, that it was impoffible for him to be fuffered long in his career of innovation, that even his life was not likely to hold out against fo many fatigues, with many other things of a like nature. Alexey's way of life, particularly his indolence and floth, were highly difpleafing to Peter. Mentchikof, from political motives, to preferve himfelf and Catharine, was conftantly employed in fanning the tzar's refentments, while Alexey's adherents, on the other hand, were embracing every opportunity for increasing the averfion of the prince, who, from his very cradle, had never known what it was to love, and had only dreaded his father. Alexey even at times gave plain intimations, that he would hereafter undo all that his father was to feduloufly bringing about. Nay, when the latter, in 1711, went on an expedition against the Turks, and appointed the prince regent during his abfence, fence, though under his fupremacy, the latter made it his first bufiness to alter many things in behalf of the clergy, fo as clearly to evince in what fchool he had been brought up. The tzar was in hopes to reform this intemperate conduct, by uniting him with a worthy confort; but even this attempt proved fruitlefs. The princefs of Brunfwic, who was felected for his bride, and with whom Alexey was married at Torgau, in 1711, notwithstanding all her eminent qualities of mind and heart, and her great beauty, could make little impression on him, and funk under the load of grief, brought on by this unhappy connection, foon after giving birth to a prince, who was called by the name of his grandfather, Peter. [1715.] By a continuance in his diffolute mode of life, by his bad behaviour towards his fpoufe, by his intercourfe with perfons who were notorious for their hatred of Peter and his reforms, Alexey feemed bent upon augmenting his father's difpleafure; accordingly, now in 1715, Peter wrote to him: " If you do not " amend, I will exclude you from the fucceffion " to the throne. If I fpare not my own life for " the good of my people, why should I spare " you ?" And in another letter, fhortly after, on Alexey's declaring that he would renounce the fucceffion : " If you were even at prefent " inclined " inclined to keep your promife, yet those long-" beards * could at any time compel you to " break it. Do you ever affist me in my ar-" duous undertakings? Do you not always " cenfure and condemn whatever I am able to " do for the benefit of my people? Have I not " reafon to believe that you will ruin all if you " furvive me? Strive, therefore, either to ren-" der yourfelf worthy of the throne, or make " choice of the monastic life." Alexey preferred the latter. Peter confented, though not immediately : but, to give him time for confideration, took a journey in the following year, 1716, to Copenhagen, and fent for the prince to him, at the fame time endeavouring to polifh him by travel and fociety. Alexey fet out from Mofco, but, inftead of proceeding to his father at Copenhagen, went to the emperor Charles VI. at Vienna, who was married to a fifter of the deceafed confort of Alexey. From Vienna Charles fent him to a fortrefs in the Tyrol, and from thence to St. Elmo, a neapolitan fortrefs, in hopes that he could here remain undifcovered under a borrowed name. This flight, as might naturally have been expected, greatly increased the indignation of the tzar. He caufed diligent inquiry to be made. The emperor made formal

remonftrances against delivering him up, but Peter made still more earnest remonstrances against his upholding and affording protection to a fon, in opposition to his parent: Alexey was accordingly given up, and returned to Mosco.

Peter now in a public proclamation declared him to have forfeited the crown. A court, confifting of 180 perfons, among whom 55 were of the clergy, was appointed to try him. Many of the ecclefiaftical judges would doubtlefs have willingly faved him, as they vifited the tzar in private, addreffed themfelves to his feelings, confeffed that he was deferving of punishment, but at the fame time reminded the tzar of the pattern prefented him by Chrift in the parable of the prodigal fon, but the temporal judges declared the prince to have incurred the penalty of death as guilty of crimes against the state. Many perfons who were accomplices in his pretended plot, for the charge was never brought home to him, to get poffeffion of the crown during his father's lifetime, or had affisted him in his flight, or accompanied him in it, were capitally executed. A manifesto was published, declaring, that the prince, on hearing the fentence of death, fell into violent convulsions, during which he expired. [1718.]

The

The reports that were fpread concerning the real manner of his death, are extremely various *. From Peter's great activity, from his indefatigable zeal to rouze his people out of that fluggifhnefs and ignorance in which he found them, and to new-model his empire in all its parts, it may reafonably enough be imagined, that, as Brutus the Roman formerly did, he might forget the father in the fovereign; the prince being by no other means to be difposed of, and as Peter must have been perfectly convinced, that, as foon as he fhould be no more, Alexey his fucceffor, fupported by the clergy, by the difcontented among the great, and by the batred, not yet entirely eradicated, of a great part of the nation towards foreigners and innovations, would completely demolifh what he, with fo much exertion, with fuch unwearied zeal for the welfare of the country had been striving to found, to eftablish, and to rectify. To free his mind from this fad profpect, he could think of no better

* Such as, that he was fecretly beheaded, and the head then fewn on to the body, that it might be exposed to the public, and that he died naturally be rendered probable. Other accounts fay, that a vein was opened, and that he was bled to death. Again, others talk of a death by the dreadful knoot.

means than by the death of a prince, who, though perhaps more weak than wicked, more misled than of himself capable of forming projects detrimental to the empire ; yet, by his weaknefs and condefcention in his future relations as fovereign of the ruffian empire, could not but be productive of harm to the country. Moreover, during the whole of the prince's trial, Peter proceeded openly, did not despotically pronounce fentence upon him, but the court declared him guilty. In the room of the condemned Alexey, the tzar nominated a prince, named Peter, whom Catharine had borne to him, to be his fucceffor; but he died in 1719. There was now remaining only Alexey's fon, Peter's grandfon, as male heir to the throne, and he was extremely young, being then [1719] only four years old. Peter, who felt that he was not likely to attain to any great age, and that he fhould not fee his grandfon grown up to maturity for the throne, was now the more anxious to appoint a fit fucceffor. In order, however, to be quite at liberty to fix his choice upon whom he would, he published in February 1722 an extremely remarkable law*, regarding the fucceffion to the throne. He

* Among other things it is therein faid, " that he pub-" lifhed this law, that the children of future monarchs might " not, He abolished the hereditary succession, and ordained, that every future monarch should be at liberty to conftitute as fucceffor to the throne, the perfon whom he fhould deem moft fit and worthy, but might revoke his choice if he faw that the perfon nominated was rendering himfelf unworthy of it. Peter's intentions in framing this law might be very laudable, but it was manifestly liable to be a fource of difcord among the members of the reigning family, and thus become dangerous to the empire. The learned bishop Theophanes was ordered by Peter to compose a work under the title of, " The right of the monarch in the " arbitrary appointment of a fucceffor to the " empire." In the meantime Peter departed this life without having appointed a fucceffor; and Catharine, taken prifoner by the Ruflians at Marienburg in 1702, became emprefs of Ruffia.

" not, from the diffolute example of Alexey, fall into fimi-" lar iniquities, but be reftrained from imitating him, by " knowing that it was in the breaft of the reigning fove-" reign to deprive them of the fuccefion."

HAVING closed the former part of this Hiftory of Russia with a few observations on the civilization and culture of the ruffian nation, from the origin of the empire to the time of Mikhaila Romanof, I will now prefent the reader with an account of the progrefs which the Ruffians have made in a variety of respects to the death of Peter the Great, and principally by his means. Accordingly, I fhall here attempt to give a comprefied reprefentation of all which that great fovereign performed and regulated. - The administration of government and laws, army and navy, ecclefiaftical affairs and fciences, arts, manufactures, trade, commerce, handicrafts and means of livelihood in general, focial life and ordinary intercourfe, the cuftoms, and manners, nay, the whole turn of mind of the ruffian nation were within the fpace of little more than the twenty years which Peter reigned, either fo' changed or fo entirely new created and formed, that it is well worth while to defcribe his influence on these feveral objects, for shewing what the Ruffians as a nation have actually gained gained by him. Previoufly, however, fome few things farther concerning his predeceffors.

MIKHAILA, the first tzar of the dynasty Romanof, acquired great merit by promoting the ruffian commerce with England and Perfia. France, likewife, in order, like England, to reap advantage from a nearer connection with Ruffia, fent an ambaflador to Mofco, and in 1629 a treaty of friendship and commerce was fettled between the two countries. ALEXEY was still more active in the extension of commerce, in the adoption of arts and trades, than his father had been; and, as his reign immediately followed on turbulent times, could poffibly be. Under him Russia became much niore acquainted with the reft of Europe. A ruffian embaffy travelled to Spain, France, and Holland. In the laft-mentioned country they were accofted with peculiar liberality and friendship; hence they therefore took away with them feveral ship-carpenters and failors, as Alexey had already conceived the defign of caufing flups to be built for failing by the Volga into the Cafpian. Defigning to carry on by means of that fea the trade with Perfia fo very important on account of its filk, which hitherto had been neceffarily profecuted by land, and which, befides that it was more expensive and troublesome, the roads 'thither thither were now become extremely unfafe, by the depredations of the kozaks. He, therefore, alfo concluded a treaty of commerce with Perfia in 1667; but Radzin's rebellion, and his robberies in the vicinity of Astrakhan, and the piracies committed by him on the Cafpian, defeated this enterprife, ere it came into play. Of longer duration, of incomparably greater and more beneficial influence on the nation, was the law-book (called Uloshenie, national-law,) which Alexey caufed to be compiled ; in which, though the code put together by Ivan *, as well as the later ordinances of the tzars, were the groundwork of it, yet a great number of the laws were altered and amended, adapted more to the then state of the nation, and feveral new ones were added. This statute-law affords abundant proof, that, from the time of Ivan, they had learned to decide more juftly concerning right and wrong, and to afcertain the punifhments on tranfgreffions of the laws with more equity, difcretion, and moderation. ' Thus, for example, it enacts,' that, " Intentional murder shall be peremptorily " punished with death in the perpetrator, and " in those who have been affisting to him. " Yet no vengeance for blood, and in general

" no felf-revenge is allowed."-" If any one be " at the fame time indebted to Ruffians, and to " foreigners, when it comes to a complaint, the " foreigners fhall have precedence in the pay-" ment." In regard to the impartial adminiftration of justice many found maxims are feen in it : " All matters between the inhabitants of " the ruffian empire shall be decided with " juffice. Foreigners, and all fettlers shall have " the very fame law, without regard to friend-" fhip or hatred. The judge fhall not have " respect to the face of the mighty, and shall " deliver the opprefied out of the hands of the " unjust. The partial judge, if his iniquity be " clearly proved, fhall pay to the complainant " threefold the demand, befides a fine or pe-" nalty to the tzar; moreover, in cafe he be a " boyar, a chamberlain, or of the council, he " shall lofe his rank; if he be an inferior he " fhall be knooted publicly in the market, and " never thenceforward be employed in any " bufinefs." Other laws muft indeed be judged of, according to the then state of the russian nation, not according to the times in which we live : thus, for inftance, inftead of the penalty of death to be inflicted, as formerly, on the fecond act of theft, it was now ordained, that only the third theft flould be a capital crime; but that the thief, for the first and second offence, should be feverely corrected, and one of his ears cut off as a mark of his guilt, and for the more imprefive warning to others.

Under Alexey a very confiderable trade was opened with China, in which the fiberian furs were delivered to the Chinese in return for filks and other stuffs, rhubarb, &c. The ruffian yufts, hemp, sope, potasies, as well as coarse linen, were already confiderable articles of exportation : on the other hand, many neceffaries were brought from other countries, particularly from Sweden the iron that was wanted, of which metal fo much was afterwards difcovered in Ruffia. That the Ruffians were now grown. fomewhat more active and industrious, was a natural confequence of the increasing trade with foreigners. Yet their activity and traffic bore no proportion with the activity and industry of the other european nations of that time. Foreigners refided among them, but the Ruffians held no intercourfe with them, except from mercantile views; in all other regards they looked upon them with fcorn. They had the greatest averfion to foreign manners, cuftoms, and arts, and even the form of their clothes differed too much from the foreign modes of drefs to allow them any near and familiar approach. The ambaffadors ambaffadors and their retinue excepted, fcarcely any Ruffian went abroad; and therefore nothing fhort of fuch a bold genius as Peter afterwards proved, could have operated efficacioufly on the temper of that nation, and in a manner incorporated what was good in other countries into his own people. Of the clergy nothing was to be expected. The generality of that body of men were rude, unformed, and ignorant, and fo illiterate, that many of them could not write. The fuperior clergy, it is true, ftood in great respect; the patriarch was the first perfon in the empire after the tzar : but the fpiritual dominion, fo far as it extended to temporal matters, had been from the remotest periods fo interwoven with the maxim that the people fhould be kept in ignorance, that nothing could be hoped for from the ruffian clergy, until they fhould be brought back to their proper defination of teachers appointed for the moral and intellectual improvement of the nation. A blind attachment to theological tenets, the attendance on church rites, a punctual obfervance of the fafts, croffing themfelves before the facred pictures, and things of like import, composed the whole effence of religion. The national character, however, of the Ruffians of those times bore undeniable marks of intrinsic worth. " If I keep not my word, may it turn c to

" to my infamy !" This, which had heretofore been the cuftomary confirmation of a promife *, was now indeed grown rather out of fashion, yet they still were much attached to fidelity and credit. Numbers of their cuftoms could not be indifferent to the formation of character. Thus, for example, it was usual on Sundays for the younger members of a family to vifit the elders of it, and to carry home with them many good leffons from the conversation of their parents and grand-parents †. There was a certain gravity peculiar to the nation, which indeed frequently degenerated into an indolent and gloomy behaviour, a formality, too great an attachment to everything traditionary, and an averfion to everything new, and not indigenous to their country. In the great towns of the empire, as Novgorod, Pscove, it was cuftomary for all the men about noon to affemble in a public place, and to difcourfe together on the various topics that occurred. In Mofco, the capital and the refidence, this was done in what was called the beautiful or the red place in the vicinity of the tzar's palace. Thefe meetings had much refemblance with the affemblies of merchants in large commercial towns, on the exchange, which perhaps might gradually arife from the intermixture of foreign merchants. So in Mofco a variety of mercantile bufinels was tranfacted, yet company and mutual converse were the primary motive of these assemblies. Accordingly, here were not only traders, but likewife perfons of all ranks, the humbleft burgher, as well as the principal boyars. Their conversation turned on public and domestic affairs, they made acquaintance, imparted advice to one another, and young perfons particularly might here pick up much good inftruction for the future management of bufinefs and houfekeeping, and a ftore of cautions confirmed from the mouth of experienced perfons; they likewife had an opportunity of recommending themfelves to fome one or other, or of getting themfelves introduced by a friend to fuch as in time might be of fervice to them. Tzar Alexey himfelf encouraged thefe public meetings very much.

† Reverence and obedience of children to parents was univerfally much regarded; as is likewife feen from fome of the laws of the land. For inftance, "When children in-" fult their parents, or even ftrike them with their hand, " and the parents make complaint of it, the children fhall " be knooted."—" A child that brings a formal procefs " againft his parent fhall not be heard, but punifhed with " the knoot, and then delivered up to the parents."

much, and was pleafed in hearing accounts of whatever paffed in them that was worthy of notice.

FEODOR, as has been before obferved, principally effected fome alterations in the notions that were current concerning the privileges arifing from pedigree, and true or falfe honour and difgrace among the nobility.

A late ruffian author draws the following picture of the Russians of that time : " Their " knowledge was certainly not multifarious; " books were not the means by which they " gained information, but the example of pa-" rents and education. They were hofpitable " and courteous without felfifhnefs. To break " the word once given, was reputed infamous *. " Lies were feverely punished even in children. " In regard to manners a certain uniformity " prevailed, and in general firmnels of prin-" ciples, a naturally found understanding, and a " right judgment. Their industry was folely " confined to the country-products." The name of barbarians, therefore, cannot with

* In proof of this the fame author observes, that masters and fervants usually bound themselves by a written contract, deposited in a public office. The strelitzes, in their infurrection, burnt these contracts; but the servants remained true to their masters notwithstanding, any

any p.opriety be beftowed on the Ruffians in general, previous to the time of Peter; though it cannot be denied, that, in comparison with other european nations of the fame period, the English, French, Germans, &c. they were some centuries behind in point of civilization, and that, particularly in the inland provinces, profound ignorance, untractableness, sloth, and, in part also, real barbarism prevailed.

I come now to the age of Peter, to fpeak of what his people gained by him in point of culture. As far as related to the GOVERNMENT, the alterations that Peter made in it were certainly advantageous to the improvement of the nation. The entire government in all its parts had hitherto ever been defpotic. The boyars, who fat at the helm of the ftate in the capital, as well as the viceroys in the provinces, decided, commanded, and acted according to their own humours. Peter abrogated what was called the boyarfkoi dvor, or court of boyars, which had hitherto conflituted the miniftry of the tzar, and without the confent whereof nothing could be enacted; appointing in its place a * SENATE

dependant on the monarch, and at the fame time ten imperial colleges, each having its own proper bufinefs within its peculiar department. In thefe no determination could be made by any one perfon, but the members were to deliver their fentiments in general confultation, and to pronounce upon the queftion by the majority of voices.

The ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE likewife was an object that Peter was very defirous of correcting for the benefit of his country; for, as many of his predeceffors had already found themfelves under the neceffity of preventing injustice in the courts by laws and penalties, fo Peter alfo was well aware that this fpecies of iniquity was extremely frequent. He therefore abolifhed most of the fees and perquisites of the courts, that the poor might not be prevented from having recourfe to law for obtaining their right, for fear of the expence. He published an amended mode of proceedings. He infifted inflexibly that ftrict and impartial justice should be administered; and when any judge was found guilty of taking bribes, of pronouncing fentence from favour or affection, or of opprefling the poor, he punished him with great feverity and without respect of perfon *. - It was his endeavour

* Thus, for inflance, Mentchikof, that all-powerful favourite of the tzar, on account of his underliand dealings, deavour therefore to fecure the common man from opprefilion, to protect the poor among the people from their fuperiors, and to provide that even in the most indigent inhabitant of the empire humanity should be honoured and be foreened from injustice and arbitrary power.

There had been great deficiences in the RE-VENUES OF THE EMPIRE till his time; as, from the bad method employed in raifing them, and from worfe management afterwards, a confiderable part remained in the hands of thofe who had the fuperintendance, fo that at laft very little came into the tzar's treafury; he made it his bufinefs to reduce this important concern of government into better order. Whereby likewife the people were gainers, by being lefs burdened, as a greater regularity prevailed, and the receivers were under clofer obfervation.

That even the LAW-BOOK, which had been compiled in the reign of Alexey, from which 1 have already quoted a few fpecimens, was ftill in want of many corrections; that chicanery was not by far fufficiently guarded againft in it, and ings, forfeited his fine eflates in the Ukraine, and moreover was obliged to pay a fine of 200,000 rubles. 1722. Peter canfed other partial judges to be knooted, turned them out, banished them to Siberia, and confiscated their eflates.

that

that it was not decifive in all cafes, had long been manifest. Peter here too made it his endeavour to promote the interests of his people. He framed feveral ftatutes and ordinances that do honour to him as a lawgiver; but they related only to particular objects. He afterwards, however, was defirous of giving out an entirely new collection of laws, completely adapted to the wants and condition of the nation, appointed a commission for that purpose in 1718, with inftructions to get it ready, and to take for the bafis of it the law-book that had been hitherto in use. He encouraged and affifted this commiffion by every means in his power, and among other things commanded, that the judges fhould in all cafes flrictly adhere to the letter of the law. But it is probable that the commiffioners were not actuated by the fame zeal and ardour with the great fovereign for the benefit of the country. They were at work five whole years, and then declared, [1723,] that the old lawbook could not ferve as a foundation, and that the basis of it must be laid on a plan entirely new. Peter, to this end, felected the danish code, adverting to the alterations necessary to be made for his empire and his nation. But - just as the commission were on the point of refuming their labours - he died, and left the continuation ation and completion of the reform of laws, which he had fo much wifhed, and towards which he had done fo much, to his fucceffors.

Thus therefore the affairs of government acquired a more orderly form, better fuited to a civilized people, the fubjects now directed their obedience rather to the laws, than to the will and caprice of their fuperiors, even the poor and lower orders had fome pretensions to right and justice, the taxes came with fewer fubtractions into the treasury of the fovereign, and in the collecting of them there was less opportunity for acts of oppression. All which must have had great influence on the rational formation of his people.

The improvements introduced into the ruffian ARMY I have already feveral times had occafion to mention; and in this refpect likewife Peter put his nation on a different footing. If war, if ftanding armies be once admitted as neceffary evils, then certainly it is meritorious in that ruler who endeavours to give his fubjects a more thorough knowledge of military art. Tumultuous and irregular attacks ceafed in Peter's time to be the method by which the fate of a battle was decided. He introduced the knowledge of artillery, the conftruction and defence of batteries, fortifications, and entrenchments, regularity and order in the attack, in the battle, and and even in retreat; and, by the art of fighting now practifed, the number of the killed is not lo great as formerly it was from the irregular manner of combat. Peter, therefore, was in reality providing for the culture of his nation, by taking experienced foreign officers into his fervice, and by the Russians, whom he fent to travel abroad, he encouraged and promoted the true art of war among his people. From all experience it appears, that those troops are the bravest where the strictest subordination prevails. Such troops, for example, were the fwedifh under Charles XII. and they were on that account extremely formidable. The ruffian foldiery, prior to Peter, were but little acquainted with this quality fo neceffary to an army; and the lamentable confequences were clearly feen even before Narva. Where genuine valour fubfists, a well-difciplined army never exercifes cruelties against a foe, not even in the enemy's country. But how furious and favage were the ruffian foldiers previous to Peter! how ungovernable the strelitzes! Patkul even frequently complains in his letters, that the ruffian foldier never knows how to behave in the enemy's country, acting cruelly even to the unarmed. At the taking of Narva, [1704,] it was in vain that Peter attempted by words to put a ftop to the 126

the plundering, the ill ufage, and the violence's committed by his foldiers, he was forced to cut down fome of them with his own hand — as a warning to others. Pcter was particularly careful to correct his foldiers of their favage cruelty, a relict from the wars of the Ruffians with the Tartars, that they might be brave but at the fame time humane. For the better guidance of their conduct, he therefore published a fystem of martial law. - Even his triumphal proceffions were calculated to fpread among his foldiers a fpirit of true courage, fhewing that they ought not to behave like robbers and affaffins, but regard themfelves as the defenders of the country, and after this just notion form themselves into valiant, but humane and generous warriors. That Peter fully attained this end I shall not pretend to affirm, but it cannot be denied, that fuch devastations as were committed by the ruffian troops in Sweden, must rather incite and nourish ferocity and favage cruelty than courage among the foldiers. Yet certainly the Ruffians, confidered as foldiers, were rendered by Peter not only more bold and courageous, but alfo, which is doubtless of greater value, far better disciplined, and of more civil manners than they were before him.

One

One thing that Peter had in view by his wars was to introduce a greater degree of activity among his people; it was alfo a primary object with him in creating a NAVY, and in founding St. Petersburg, as a new commercial town in the vicinity of the Baltic. Were it true, as has been afferted, that in his early youth he was uncommonly afraid of the water, and had therefore to conquer his difpofition before he could bring himfelf to go on board of a fhip, it would be ftill the more admirable, that the conviction that a fleet would be of great benefit to his country, and contribute to their moral improvement, should bring him to the refolution of getting the better of that averfion. On his acceffion-to the government, he found not the flightest preparations towards a navy, but created himfelf a fleet and an admiralty, as well as by the harbours which he conquered in the Baltic, and by his newly founded city, he conferred upon his country a far greater opportunity for commerce and dealings with other nations, as a vent for the products and manufactures of it, and, therefore, at the fame time rouzed their activity ftill farther.

In regard to RELIGION, Peter unquestionably had clearer perceptions than any of his predeceffors on the throne of the tzars. His good natural natural understanding, his found judgment, probably too his travels, and his intercourfe with foreigners, and with men of all ranks, and of the different creeds, taught him very foon to diftinguish religion from church-rites, to diferiminate between the leffons of Chrift and the doctrines of the fchools, and to form just ideas of what conftitutes the true effence and fpirit of religion *. It had ftruck him forcibly, while yet very young, that ecclefiaftical authority could have no good political tendency, unlefs it were entirely fubordinate to the temporal power. The ruffian prelates, especially the patriarchs at Mofco, thared with the tzars the fupreme command. The patriarch Philaretes, as I have faid before, was held in the higheft veneration by tzar Mikhaila his fon, and, though not in name, was actually co-fovereign. The fucceeding pa-

* As an inflance of his firmnefs of mind, the following anecdote is related. Once as he lay very fick, it was reprefented to him, that he fhould now, according to the practice of the former tzars, grant a free pardon to feveral capital delinquents, in order by this pious act to obtain from God the fpeedier refloration of his health. Inflead of following this fuperflitious advice, he commanded thefe culprits to be immediately brought to trial, and if they were found guilty, to lofe no time in executing fentence upon them, as he hoped that this would be more agreeable to God than the letting fuch rafeals loofe again upon the world.

triarchs were never by their own confent of lefs confideration than Philaretes. - This was particularly the cafe with Nicon, patriarch of Ruffia under Alexey (from 1652 to 1658). Undoubtedly he had the principal fhare in quelling the novgorodian infurrection *, and his conduct on that occasion was highly laudable +. But as foon as the title of patriarch was conferred upon him, he wanted to be fomething more than primate of the clergy, he required that his voice should be of greater weight in matters of government than that of others; and, on finding that his advice was not followed in all things, he voluntarily refigned the patriarchate and retired into a monaftery which he had previoufly built. But even here he would not be quiet; by his fpiritual pride he offended tzar Alexey, and was continually affronting the great men of the court, till at length he was formally depofed

* See before, p. 18. of this volume.

† It is faid of him, that during a fearcity at Novgorod, he let no poor perfon go from him without a good bellyfull, that he diffributed every day money and bread among the neceffitous, founded four poor-houfes, vifited the prifoners, punifhed their vices, fet the innocent at liberty, and was the common protector of the poor against their hard mafters. At Mosco, likewise, Nicon made it his business to receive all petitions addreffed to the tzar, and on a certain day in the week to deliver them to him.

from the patriarchate, and degraded to what he had originally been, a fimple monk [1666]. Nicon was the author of much good while archbifhop of Novgorod; and he afterwards attempted fome reforms in regard to devotional books, introduced the greek church-mufic, hitherto only ufed in Kief, into the reft of Ruffia, and thus, as chief religious teacher of the empire, fhewed himfelf active for the improvement of what is called divine fervice; he even frequently delivered fermons, (at that time a practice extremely rare,) and, as he was a very eloquent man, and highly reverenced by the people, effected much good.

But Nicon's hiftory throughout was a very important example to fovereigns of what an inordínate fpiritual power may lead to, and a convincing proof that the patriarchs might very eafily become rivals of the authority due only to the tzar *. Peter, therefore, from this example, deduced the maxim, that it would cer-

* To what length the patriarchs had extended their power, may be judged of by this among other circumitances, that, on Palm-funday, when a proceffion was held, the tzar not only went on foot, while the patriarch rode, but was even obliged to lead the horfe of the fpiritual cavalier by the bridle. — Can it be a queffion, whether, at leaft on that day, the patriarch was not greater than the fovereign in the eyes of the populace ?

tainly be better not to leave any longer the fupreme spiritual power in the hands of a fingle perfon, left, by infenfible degrees, a pope might grow up in Ruffia, fharing the fovereignty with the monarch, or even fet him at defiance and directly oppose him. It was necessary for him, however, to proceed flowly and warily in the execution of his plan: fo, therefore, he did, and in that particular likewife fhewed bimfelf, though an enterprifing, yet a fagacious monarch, knowing how to prepare his people for the regulations he was meditating to introduce. The patriarch Adrian had died in 1700; and, though Peter was even then already firmly refolved not to confer that dignity again, yet he did not proceed immediately to put his refolution in force. He excufed himfelf for the prefent, from the multiplicity of bufiness brought on him by the war, as not being able to attend with proper earnestness to fo important a matter as the appointment of a perfon to fill the patriarchal throne. - Having thus gained time, he now gradually brought on the intended alteration. He began by conflituting an administrator of the patriarchal functions, with power, however, of deciding in very indifferent matters alone, to confult on more important affairs with other bishops, and ultimately to refer everything to K'2 the

the determination of the tzar. Thus the nation was by little and little accustomed to live without a patriarch. And when at length he thought it now time to be able to go through with his alteration, he proclaimed, in January 1721, that the patriarchal dignity was abolifhed, and in its ftead, for the future, the government of the church was to be conducted by a fpiritual confiftory composed of feveral members. This confiftory, at the fittings whereof Peter himfelf frequently attended, obtained the title of THE HOLY DIRECTING SYNOD, was immediately under the tzar, who appointed the members of it. In this manner Peter recovered to the fovereigns of Ruffia the fupremacy of the church, and made his people independent on the defpotifm of the fpiritual power; and all this was effected by Peter, who owed nothing to others for the forming of his mind, at a time when Lewis XIV. was entirely governed by his clergy, and fuffered a great part of his fubjects to be hunted out of the country on account of religion, a proceeding not les impolitic thán unjuft, and therefore contrary to religion. Peter alfo determined to reform the monasterics, to diminish the number of monks and nuns, and fo render the religious houfes lefs hurtful to population, and at the fame time to affign ufeful employments

ments to their inhabitants, of whom he expressly fays, in his decree, that the majority are lazy drones. All those monks who entered the convent not to fludy there, and hereafter to become bishops (as in Russia the offices of the superior clergy are filled by regulars), were now to employ themfelves in nurfing and waiting on the poor as well as difbanded foldiers, who, for that purpose were to be distributed among the monasteries. The nuns were to keep schools for poor girls, to teach them female works, and likewife to admit and fuccour the poor of their own fex. - Unfortunately, however, thefe regulations of Peter, in regard to religious houfes of all denominations, produced but little effect, as he died the fame year in which he decreed them.

His TOLERATION had still a greater influence on the intellectual improvement of his people, by which he allowed christians *, who were not of the greek perfuasion, to build churches in feveral parts of his empire, and Russians of either fex to marry with perfors of other communions. This indeed excited the zealous fury of the major part of the clergy. Peter, however, * Only he would by no means tolerate the jefuits in his country. He was not pleafed while at the court of Vienna, becaufe, as he faid, he met jefuits everywhere.

would not be diflurbed at it, but purfued his courfe, affociating with heretics, though for fo doing he had the name of Antichrift beftowed on him, and biblical paffages concerning Antichrift directly applied to him. He neverthelefs attained his aim, by habituating his nation gradually to think more reafonably, and even to confort familiarly with the professions of 'a different creed. In order, likewife, to make his people acquainted with what was contained in the bible, and confequently with the dostrines of religion and what has been in aftertimes added to them, he caufed the Bible to be translated and printed in the fclavonian language. This however went on fo tedioufly, from the continued opposition . of the clergy, that only the new testament was finished before his death, of which he had the copies fetched from the prefs as fast as they were ready, and difperfed among the people. - Even the clergy were benefited under Peter, as he held worthy perfons of that denomination in high efteem. Theophanes, a learned and eloquent divine, who had fpent three years at Rome, and had improved himfelf by travel, attended him in his campaign against the Turks, gave him very active affiftance in his reforms of the clergy, and was appointed conjointly with the archbishop of Novgorod, vice-prefident of the the fynod. - Befides this meritorious prelate, Peter's reforms produced feveral rational and learned members among the clerical order.

From all this it may be inferred, that Peter not only removed what was detrimental to the ftate in it, while the ecclefiaftical authority was diffinct from the temporal, but that he likewife contributed much to eradicate the extravagant and pernicious opinion of the fanctity of an inactive monastic life, to accustom his people to toleration for perfons of a different faith, and to open their eyes concerning what was religion and what had been grafted upon it.

ARTS AND SCIENCES in Ruffia were still in their infancy previous to the reign of Peter. That prince in thefe likewife began to do fomething for his country, and to lay the foundation in this respect to farther improvement. He endowed at Petersburg a feminary for future navigators, as well as a mathematical fchool at Mofco. He caufed fome public libraries to be fet up, inftituted a museum at St. Petersburg, for which he collected productions of nature and art himfelf on his travels, fetched other collections from abroad, and at the fame time made it a repofitory for all kinds of natural products found in the ruffian empire. This inflitution he devoted to the nation at large. Every one had had free entrance here, and by the contemplation of nature, or the works of human industry, might acquire juster conceptions and an encouragement to activity. He provided a ruffian printing-office, caufed ufeful books * to be tranflated from foreign languages into rufs, and, by means of the prefs, difperfed them among his people. The academy of fciences at St. Peterfburg, founded by him, and which has always contributed in an uncommon degree to extend the knowledge of Ruffia among foreigners as well as natives, was enjoined by his plan to write learned books, afterwards to translate them into the vulgar tongue, that they might be put into the hands of the common people, particularly of the youth. The obfervatory which he had infpected at Paris on his fecond journey through a part of Europe, raifed in him a wifh to have a like beneficial eftablishment; and prefently after his return an obfervatory was built at St. Peterfburg. He himfelf took great pains to acquaint himfelf with the course of the heavenly bodies, and when he had acquired fome knowledge of aftronomy, frequently converfed on it with the great men of his court, in order to expand their ideas a little; telling them, for instance, that an eclipfe of the fun or the moon was an appearance altogether as natural as rain or funshine, of which it was then as difficult to perfuade the Ruffians, as it has, even more recently, been found to convince the natives in other countries. Peter, who was ever ready as much as poffible to combat and deftroy fuperstition, ordered it to be publicly announced, in 1715, that an eclipfe of the fun would happen on fuch a day, in order to make it apparent that this event was not ominous of any difaster, or an awful menace of divine judgments. As the observatory of St. Petersburg was a fruit of his travels, he had likewife, on his first and fecond journey, procured artifts and men of letters in England, Holland, Germany and France, whom he fent into his empire on terms very agreeable to them, that they might contribute by their writings, or by the exercife of their arts, and by instruction imparted to the young Russians, to the improvement of the nation. For the fame reafon youths were felected and fent to travel at his expence in foreign countries. And as, by means of his good natural understanding, he very foon acquired a knowledge of feveral arts and

and fciences, he prefcribed to the young perfons whom he had fent abroad, what they were particularly to fludy, examined them hunfelf on their return, observed whether they had properly employed their opportunities of learning, or had passed the time in idleness; the expert he put into places that fuited their attainments, encouraged and promoted them, and punished the unimproved by taking no farther notice of them, or by affigning to them pofts in which they could get neither honour nor profit. For the more general cultivation of the Ruffians, it were indeed to be willed that their famous fovereign Peter had bestowed greater care on the first education, on the elementary institution of the youth in schools. Though both his father. and his brother had already done fomething in this refpect by erecting fome fchools and inftitutions for the information of youth; yet it was but a very fmall beginning. On the whole, most of the schools in Russia, even in the time of Peter, were upon a very milerable footing; and Peter, who gave himfelf fo much concern on a variety of objects, did here far lefs than could have been wifhed, and than he perhaps would have done if he had attained to a greater age. Under him, indeed, it must be owned, though without his concurrence, and only by accident, fome fome fcattered rays of reafon and moral light pierced even to the inclement regions of Siberia: as the fwedifh prifoners who were fent thither by Peter, and particularly the officers, erected fchools in those frozen climes, and inftructed the natives in many useful branches of knowledge *. Even these unfortunate perfons, who did not obtain permission to return to Sweden till the peace of Nystadt, contributed, therefore, in fome measure, to drive ignorance out of Russia.

MANUFACTURES, TRADES, MECHANICAL ARTS, BUSINESSES, AND OBJECTS OF INDUSTRY OF ALL KINDS, were the principal aim of Peter's active mind; and doubtles in these respects he cultivated his nation greatly more, and advanced it higher than it had been before. His having himself acquired a knowledge of the generality of matters of that nature, his having always been, while on his travels, an inquisitive and attentive observer of everything that related to them, not unfrequently himself putting a hand to the work *, and concerning himfelf in general about the minuteft trifles, as well as about the greater parts and the whole, muft unqueftionably have had a vaft influence on the progrefs of his people, among whom it was his endeavour to transplant whatever was good and useful among foreigners.

And, while a traveller, he obferved, examined, and informed himfelf thoroughly of everything that fell under his notice, in order to employ and to apply what he had feen for the benefit of his empire †, he alfo font young Ruffians into foreigncountries

* It is well known that both in Holland and in England he not only cauled himfelf to be fhewn what was molt material in the dockyards, but even worked at the feveral bufineffes with his own hands. According to our countryman, captain Perry, whom Peter took with him from London to Ruffia as an engineer, there was no kind of work, from the cafting of cannons to the making of ropes, that furnifhed anything to fhip-building, in which Peter had not acquired the cleareft notion of every particular, and had even fet his hand to work at. Even in Ruffia he executed fomething or other in every workfhop that he vifited; onewhile hammering iron as a fmith, at another employed as a carpenter ; he once even built a whole wall with bricks: but his favomite bufinefs was that of a thipwright.

† He even fent a model of a coffin to Ruffia. In general, nothing appeared to him fo infignificant as that he did not vouchfafe it his attention, as foon as he thought that any benefit might arife out of it to his country. Thus, flortly before countries to fludy and follow the art of fhipbuilding, and other useful occupations, that at their return they might teach others; and for the fame purpole took into his pay many foreigners, emigrant Frenchmen, Scotfmen and Germans, among whom were feveral very able men. He put the manufactory of finall arms upon an excellent footing, fet up forges for anchors, and built a number of mills, instituted manufactories for linen, failcloth, cordage, filk and woollen stuffs, built in the neighbourhood of St. Peterfburg a multitude of brick and tile kilns; and acting differently from Charles XII. who conquered Poland without deriving from it any benefit to Sweden, nay, which was indeed injured by it, caufed sheep and shepherds to come from that country, for the fake of improving the breed of fheep in Ruffia. He also zealoufly promoted before the conclusion of the fwedifh war, he had brufh-makers, balket-makers, even butter-women with butter-firkins, nay ratcatchers and dutch cats brought to Ruffia. He had heard that the dutch cats were famous for preventing the mifchief occasioned by mice and rats in ships and houses. So attentive was he to the minutest objects, that, perceiving the ruffian boors made better mat-shoes than the finnish peafants in the neighbourhood of St. Petersburg, he distributed ruffiau mat-shoemakers in Finland, that they might communicate their art to the Finns.

inquiries into the manner of exploring and working mines, particularly in Siberia; and, in order to render it more methodical and regular, conflituted a peculiar mineral-college, to which he gave the in/pection over the works to be carried on. He greatly improved the docks and yards at Archangel, and formed new ones at Petersburg and Voronetch. He took delight in affifting fuch perfons as were inclined to undertake manufactories and workfhops, by advancing them money, and granting them privileges. Thus industry and trade were continually gaining by him in an extraordinary degree; and what I remarked above of the fwedifh prifoners in Siberia, that they ftrewed the feeds of fome improvement even in that part of the ruffian empire, is applicable alfo in a particular manner, in regard to useful handicrafts. Even the fwedifh officers employed themfelves here, partly for want of other means of fupport, in a variety of mechanical arts and trades. In their diffrefsful fituation, being reduced to the neceffity of applying themfelves to confider and to imitate what they had feen in Sweden and other countrics, they became the teachers of the inhabitants of the country, diffeminated their knowledge among them, and inftructed them in feveral profitable employments.

142

Not

Not lefs important was the progrefs which the Ruffians made under Peter in regard to COM-MERCF. Inconfiderable and confined as it was, prior to his reign, fo much did he contribute to the advancement and extension of it, and thereby rouzed and formed his nation to greater activity, by procuring them more traffic, more connections with Europe and Afia than they formerly had.

The trade with the bordering empire of China feemed to fecure many advantages to Ruffia, as each of the two countries poffeffed those natural products of which the other was in want. Peter foon turned his attention to this matter. A peace concluded between China and Ruffia in 1689, by which the numerous difputes concerning the boundaries of the two empires were finally adjusted, had determined the chinese government to adopt an amicable behaviour. Peter immediately took advantage of the opportunity to fettle the trade between the Ruffians and the Chinefe on a more firm and lafting eftablishment; and afterwards, when, on account of complaints that had arifen concerning fome diforders that had been committed by the Ruffians in China, fent a new embaffy to that country to fettle all mifunderstandings, and to revive the trade. The acquifition of the peninfula of Kamtfhatka

Kamtfhatka and the Kurilly iflands, which happened in the reign of Peter, contributed likewife to the extension of the ruffian commerce.

But the event of greateft confequence to the trade and commerce of the Ruflians in Europe, was undoubtedly the dominion of the Baltic, which Peter wrefted from Sweden, and the conqueft of feveral maritime towns on the coafts of that fea, a fovereignty which he endeavoured more folidly to eftablifh, and to render more advantageous to his empire, by the city of Peterfburg, through which the Ruflians obtained the most favourable opportunity for trading with the Dutch.*, the Englifh, the French and the Germans.

The effects of Peter's endeavours to facilitate and to extend the commerce of his empire, and by that means to raife his country to a higher degree of civilization, were the cutting of CANALS, the inflitution of POSTS, provision for making and repairing HIGHWAYS and ROADS, regulations for equal WEIGHTS and MEASURES, * Thefe principally purfued the navigation to Peterfburg, and the tzar's predilection for a people, among whom he had lived a long while, the reciprocal partiality of the Dutch for Peter, who had left his throne to gain a knowledge of ufeful mechanical arts in their workfhops and on their quays, connected the dutch and ruffian nations in a clofe and lafting union.

for putting the MINT on a better plan, and rectifying the COINAGE, and the erection of a BOARD of COMMERCE. By the LADOGA CANAL he rendered the transport from the Volkhof into the Neva incomparably more fafe than it had hitherto been. The canal which he made at Vishnei-Volotshok *, with its fluices, connects the Cafpian with the Baltic. Peter was heartily defirous likewife of bringing into conjunction the Euxine with the Cafpian, and, as the latter, by the just mentioned canal, already joined the Baltic, by the fame channel alfo to unite the former with that fea: but the grand undertaking, on which he had already confumed a great deal of labour, was dropped, and ftill remains unexecuted t.

* At Tver the Tvertza falls into the Volga, which difcharges itfelf into the Cafpian; the canal unites the Tvertza with the Schlina; this flows into the Milta, and this into the Ilmen lake, from which the Volkhof takes its rife, and is in connection with the Baltic.

† In the vicinity of Tzaritzin are the two great rivers, the Don, which rufhes into the Euxine, and the Volga, fcarcely 60 english miles assure, and by means of two small rivers, one flowing into the Don, and the other into the Volga, would, if these rivers could be made navigable, require only a canal of about two english miles, to unite the Don with the Volga. In the reign of Alexey [1663] a german merchant at Mosco made some attempts at the introduction of a POST-OFFICE. Till then all letters were obliged to be fent by meffengers, or as opportunity ferved; the former method being as expensive as the latter was unfafe. Travellers could proceed from one place to another only in their own carriages and fledges, for which they were forced to hire horfes of the boors. This was much altered by Peter. He inftituted, what had been done in France in the fifteenth, and in Germany at the beginning of the fixteenth century, regular pofts between the principal towns of the empire, and a packet boat between St. Peterfburg and Lubeck.

For the more effectual facilitation of communication between the feveral parts of the country, Peter employed his care to the maintenance and reparation of the ROADS. He caufed them to be greatly improved, and, by a police, on a fimilar plan with that in France, cleared them from beggars and vagrants, and erected inns at various stations.

The great advantage of LIKE WEIGHTS AND MEASURES in all parts of the empire to trade, to buyers and fellers, Ruffia owes likewife to Peter the Great; who alfo provided the country with a proper MINT, by taking feveral french mint-mafters and affayers into his fervice.

The BOARD OF TRADE inflituted by Peter, the members whereof confifted in one half of native Ruffians, and the other half of foreigners, undoubtedly contributed much to the encouragement of trade; as formerly it often happened, that when foreigners had a procefs with natives in the ordinary courts, the ruffian judges fhewed great partiality to their countrymen. Tzar Alexey had indeed already attempted by feveral laws to put a ftop to this injuftice *; but Peter's provision concerning the affeffors of the board of trade was certainly a more effectual remedy to the evil, than any laws could be.

The WAY OF LIFE, and in general the whole face of fociety, as well as the MANNERS and CUSTOMS of Ruffia, underwent a very great revolution in the time of Peter, and were in various refpects new moulded.

In order to render the Ruffians more like the other civilized nations of Europe, Peter, at the commencement of the year 1700, abolished the old ruffian calendar and introduced the corrected flyle. The ancient Ruffians, in common with all the flavonian nations, began the year with the month of March. In the year 1343 the greek mode of computation of time was adopted in Ruffia, according to which the beginning of the year fell in the month of September. This Peter now likewife altered, and decreed that, as in the reft of Europe, in Ruffia the first of January fhould for the future be the first day of the year; in this change however he did not adopt the gregorian *, but the old julian calendar which is still used in Russia. - The people indeed murmured not a little at this innovation; but Peter, regardless of it, on the first of January 1700, appointed great folemnitics to be held, at which the new regulation was proclaimed, which was also ordered to be notified from the pulpits in the courts of justice and in the public places of the feveral towns of the empire. By these and other methods the Russians were brought gradually to a familiarity with this and the rest of his alterations.

Nothing of acknowledged utility in other countries efcaped the notice of fo attentive an obferver as Peter; and accordingly he endowed, two HOSPITALS in St. Peterfburg on the plan of thofe at Amfterdam, for fuperannuated or infirm foldiers and failors, and an infirmary at Mofco. ORPHAN and FOUNDLING-HOUSES were either new-built or enlarged and improved. The police in France had, during his ftay in that country, met with his entire approbation; immediately, therefore, on his return [1718] he infituted a POLICE-OFFICE in Peterfburg, to which he committed the care of the internal fecurity of the empire.

To guard against the ruin of families he prohibited all games of hazard, and at the fame time preferibed bounds to extravagance in drefs.

By a TABLE OF PRECEDENCE, which extended to all perfons in office, whether military, civil, or at court, dividing them into fourteen classes, he endeavoured to check the frequently.

ridiculous pretenfions and difputes in regard to rank and pre-eminence, and likewife abolifhed the court of nobles *. In conformity to this table even the fons of ruffian princes, counts, barons, &c. have indeed, in refpect of their defcent and the merits of their fathers, accefs to the affemblies at court, but not the leaft degree of rank till they have done fervice to the country in fome department. Married ladies enjoy the rank of their hufbands; but unmarried ladies muft go back four claffes †.

Society was a thing almost unknown to the manners then prevalent in the ruffian nation. Peter accomplished much likewife in this respect, convinced as he was that intercourfe and fociety could not be inefficient in the cultivation of a people, but must contribute to a greater expanfion of the faculties, to bring truths, opinions, judgments, and ideas into more rapid circulation; and that therefore a fociable people would be more fensible than an unfociable. In order, therefore, to fet the fashion, as he knew that the example of the higher orders invites the lower

They were kept three times a week in the houses of the principal perfons of quality in rotation." Peter and Catharine frequented them in perfon; but all formality and conftraint were banifhed * All perfons of rank, noblemen, fuperior offi-" cers, respectable merchants, ship-builders, and other people of condition had free admiffion with their wives and children. That ladies too fhould take part in fuch companies was a thing as yet unheard of in Russia. Hitherto even married women, only on certain great holidays and in company with their hufbands, could venture to vifit their nearest relations. They lived retired in the back part of the house, and were

* " The affemblies," it is faid, in the orders that were published concerning them, " shall not begin earlier " than four o'clock in the afternoon, and continue only " till ten in the evening. The host is not obliged to re-" ceive or to wait upon the guests, or to give them his com-" pany; but must provide chairs, lights, liquors, and a " variety of entertainments. The guests may divide into " the apartments, in one of which may be dancing, in the " other cards, chefs, or draughts may be played; in a " third tobacco may be smoaked, &c. very very much confined *. Unmarried ladies were kept in ftill greater conftraint. These feverities Peter did his utmost to remove, by declaring that women ought not to be excluded from the comforts of focial intercourfe; and they teftified their gratitude to him for it. He wanted to alter the afiatic drefs of the Ruffians, and to introduce that generally worn in the other parts of Europe. He therefore made it one of the rules to be observed in the forementioned affemblies, that every one must appear in the light modern drefs; and the female fex, who had obtained more liberty by Peter's means, carefully and with chearfulnefs adhered to this rule. It was far more difficult to bring the men to an alteration in their drefs, which, however, in Peter's opinion, might much contribute to leffen the hatred entertained by his countrymen against foreigners. - He commanded all his subjects (the clergy, boors, Tartars, Kalmuks, and tribes of their class excepted,) to shave their beards --An order to which violent opposition was made. For enforcing this regulation he laid a tax on long beards, and great numbers fubmitted to pay it rather than part with their beard which was univerfally held to be an ornament to the perfon. Superfitious Russians even thought it an outward characteristic of the orthodox faith, (for in what trifles has not orthodoxy been made to confift?) and, if too poor, or too parfimonious, to pay the tax for retaining the beard, they religiously preferved the beard shorn off, and had it deposited in the coffin with them on their decease, that they might prefent it to St. Nicholas, on his refufing to admit them, as beardless christians, into the kingdom of heaven. - Peter wanted likewife to effect an alteration in the DRESS of the men. Accordingly, whoever was in his fervice must appear in clothes of a foreign cut, and under all the gates of the town patterns of these clothes were even hung up*.

Peter also refolved to give his people a tafte for the DRAMA. Before his time, at Kief and Mofco spiritual plays were performed occasionally in the monasteries. Under his patronage a national theatre was formed at Mosco, which, however, it must be owned, was bad enough.

* Whofe coat was not agreeable to this pattern must pay a fine, or fubmit to have fo much of it cut off as exceeded the flandard. Many likewife had their beards cut off in the ftreets. In regard to drefs, the clergy, boors, &c. were alfo excepted. In marking a

More was done in this matter by his female fucceffors.

In the times anterior to Peter it was ufual for parents to conclude marriages for their children; and the young people never faw one another till they were to be betrothed. A cuftom which was certainly attended with many inconveniences. Peter made a law that every young couple fhould frequent one another for fix weeks at leaft previous to the betrothing.

In order to difcredit in the eyes of his people the old ufages, many of which were indeed highly ridiculous, Peter had recourfe to various methods. At times he appointed an entertainment, at which every thing was to proceed on the old footing, in which his defign was to difplay the difference between the ancient and modern manners, and to fhew the fuperiority of the latter in a way irrefiftibly ftriking. Thus, for example, he once celebrated the nuptials of one of his court-fools in a most magnificent manner; but entirely in the ftyle of the fixteenth century. The guefts were obliged to appear in the drefs after the fashion of that time. No fire was lighted, though the weather was intenfely cold; becaufe it was an old fuperflitious notion, that the kindling of a fire on the wedding day was unłucky.

unlucky. The old Ruffians were fond of mead and brandy, but drank no wine - this particular was therefore punctually obferved. The guests shewed themselves highly discontented at " This was exactly the cuftom with our it. " forefathers," Peter answered them fmiling; " and furely old cuftoms are preferable to new " ones." Thus jeeringly giving them a good leffon. It was then ufual to keep fools for the diversion of the court; and, indeed, till very lately the nobility always had one about the houfe: nor is the practice yet entirely left off in the country. The court-fools used frequently to make themfelves merry with the old fashions, cuftoms, and manners, mimicking many of the ftiff obstinate sticklers for the antiquated style; and, on their complaining to Peter of the affront, he generally answered them: They are FOOLS, what can be done with them ?

From what has been faid, it plainly appears that Peter in many refpects gave a new turn to the manner of thinking and acting of the ruffian nation. I fhall only fubjoin a few obfervations. The extraordinary and indefatigable activity of this monarch: one while undertaking a fiege at a diftance from his empire, or fighting at the head of his army, then fuddenly appearing in the refidence, and frequenting the fittings of the fenate, fenate, or prefenting himfelf in the courts of justice, or confulting with the clergy on ecclefiaftical reforms, or felecling ingenious perfons to fend out on travels; now undertaking a journey himfelf; working in foreign countries in the dockyards and workshops; becoming an attentive fcholar in the fludies of literary men, at Amsterdam with the naturalist Ruysch, or, as at Paris, visiting an academy of sciences; then re-appearing in his empire, and there making dispositions for establishing a manufactory; in one place caufing a canal to be dug, in another ordering fhips to be built; to-day publishing an ordinance relating to proceffes in the courts, to-morrow iffuing a table of precedence; one moment feverely punishing a judge who had fuffered himself to be corrupted, the next rewarding another for fervices performed to the country; now holding a triumphal entry, then paffing the whole day in the muleum of the works of nature and art of his own inftitution, in the contemplation of nature, and the great performances of human industry and contrivance - in fhort, that in all his undertakings for the good of his country he was obliged to work and act himfelf, as he was in want of able perfons to whom he should need only to trace out a plan, and then could leave the execution to their their care — fuch a vaft activity must furely have rouzed in fome degree the Ruffians, who were apt to let their faculties lie dormant, from their inaction, animate them to the employment of their abilities, and teach them to confider industry as a good and useful property.

Peter, by prizing and rewarding merit whereever he found it, by fhewing that the man of the lowest flation, if he were but expert and useful, was in higher estimation with him than the dull and indolent, though of the first family of the empire, must have tended greatly to banish the idle pretensions to ancessary and hereditary confequence out of the heads of the russian nobility, to diffuse juster notions of the true worth of man, and at the fame time to encourage and animate the talents of a number of young perfons of the inferior ranks of fociety.

Peter, by ferving upwards through the feveral flations in the army and navy, gave likewife a fit leffon to the nobles of the empire, as on the other hand it must have flattered the common foldier and failor, to fee his humble flation honoured fo far as that even the fovereign did not difdain to fill it, and thereby to confefs that it was ferviceable to the flate.

Peter, by working himfelf at the ordinary mechanical trades, must have confiderably weakened ened the prejudice, then very common in Ruffia, that they who paffed their days in a luxurious eafe were happier than they who were doomed to work, and helped to diffeminate the maxim; that induftry brings content.

Peter habituated his Ruffians to adopt what was profitable in others, and not to defpife and neglect a foreigner, becaufe he was a foreigner; confequently altered in this refpect the national way of thinking, as the people had hitherto always entertained an averfion for all foreigners.

Such is the brief account of what the ruffian nation gained by Peter the Great; who, though as a man, was not certainly free from fome of the vices of his nation, fuch as drunkennefs and cruelty, yet raifed himfelf fo far above his countrymen, that he was not improperly termed a wonder of his times, that pofterity has unanimoufly acknowledged him to be one of the greateft of mankind, as well as of monarchs, who for the moft part formed himfelf, that the ruffian nation with gratitude proclaims his great merits both towards the empire and towards the people, and allows that this one fovereign advanced and improved them farther than the whole feries of former princes had done.

Peter indeed has been blamed for bringing fo many ftrangers into his country, and for having

operated upon it, and generally ruling it more by strangers and foreigners, than the improvement of the people by their own powers rendered neceffary. But it is to be fuppofed that he was fo well acquainted with his countrymen, as to know that their abilities were only to be called forth by the method he made choice of; a method which had ever been adopted by the wifeft of his anceftors, Ivan, Boris, and Alexey; and if he had frequently recourfe to harfh or cruel measures, we may imagine he thought them neceffary in Ruffia. Nothing but the unalterable will of a fovereign could have executed here those arduous tasks. Peter had nothing but that to oppose to superstition, prejudice, felfishness, and an utter abhorrence of all innovation, for effectually carrying those alterations which to him appeared nec Tary.

Of all the tzar's innovations, that which was attended with the greatest difficulty, and occafioned him to shed the most blood, was the alteration of the habit that had been for ages worn by his subjects. It was with extreme reluctance that the Russians submitted to wear the german drefs, and to be shaved; and they several times rebelled for the sake of retaining their long garments and their beard. But Peter had ia in view, by giving his people the fafhions of the other nations of Europe, to introduce among them their manners, without forefecing, perhaps, that he was calling up a tafte for luxury, of which he was not fond. That prince was always very plain in his drefs, kept a very frugal houfe, was not more than a quarter of an hour at dinner, and would frequently laugh at his favourite Mentchikof, who, from nothing more than a pye-boy at the corner of a ftreet, being now a prince, difplayed a pomp and magnificence hitherto unequalled'; and never fat down to dinner without the mufic of trumpets and cymbals and various other inftruments.

In regard to the fimplicity of his attire, the following is related in the manufcript memoirs of a diplomatic agent, who refided a long time at his court. " On all the folemn feftivals, he " only wore the uniform of his préobajenfkoi " regiment of guards. I faw him in 1721 give " a public audience to the ambaffadors of " Perfia. He entered the hall of audience in " nothing more than a furtout of coarfe brown " cloth. When he was feated on the throne, " the attendants brought him a coat of blue " gros-de-Naples, embroidered with filver, " which he put on with great precipitation, be-" caufe

His violence can never be excufed, and his cruelties admit of no palliation. He not only chaftifed with his own hand the courtiers, his generals, his minifters, for any flight fault they had committed; but he himfelf was often the executioner of the wretches whom he had caufed to be fentenced to death.

His rage, it is true, was not always fo fatal; but, whether this monarch was really not mafter of himfelf, or whether he intended to make his fubjects believe that nothing in nature ought to refift his will, he fometimes did things which in any other man would have paffed for acts of infanity.

* The blue-filk embroidered coat is the identical one which is now on his wax effigy in the academy of fciences, and it was made for his marriage with Catharine.

VOL. II.

After

After being returned from his travels, defigning one day to exhibit a proof of his fkill in navigation, he took the exercise of failing in a fmall veffel on the lake Ladoga, which is often very tempestuous, and just then was more agitated than usual. Peter, being frightened, regained the shore; but being angry that the waves had no more respect for him, he sent for the executioner of the town, and ordered him to give the knoot to the intractable lake.

And what are we to think of that endlefs comedy in which Peter I. cauled himfelf to be reprefented by knæz Romodanofsky, the most vulgar and brutal of all the Ruffians, while he himfelf affected to play a fubaltern part? He conferred on Romodanoffky the title of tzar of Mofco; made a public report to him of all his undertakings and his most important fucceffes; all petitions, memorials, and other documents, addreffed to the fovereign, were prefented to this phantom of a tzar, who privately difpatched them to the council; and when the perfons concerned, on not obtaining what they defired, complained to Peter, he answered coldly: " It " is not my fault; all depends on the tzar of " Molco."

A refufal was not the only inconvenience they had to apprehend from the infenfible and capricious Romodanofsky. He kept in his palace palace a bear of enormous magnitude, and broke to a very curious trick. The animal prefented to every one who wifhed to fpeak with his mafter a great glafs of brandy, in which there was a ftrong dofe of pepper. Whoever did not drink off this liquor was fure to have his cloaths torn to pieces by the bear, and to be feverely fcratched into the bargain.

After having abolished the office of patriarch, Peter I. in confequence of his refolution to crown his confort Catharine, in 1725 applied for that purpole to the archbishop of Novgorod, primate of all Ruffia. The prelate, thinking this a favourable opportunity for getting the patriarchate re-established in his favour, obferved to the tzar, that fo august a ceremony would acquire far greater folemnity by the presence of a patriarch. The tzar answered him no otherwife than as he was wont to do fuch of his fubjects as he was difpleafed with, that is, by a fhower of ftrokes with his cane. The archbishop asked pardon; the tzar was pacified; the coronation was performed, and nothing more was faid of a patriarch.

Mentchikof was the fon of a pye-man, and paffed a part of his youth in felling little pies about the ftreets. One day, felling fome of his paftry in a houfe where feveral perfons had met to breakfast, one of the party having drank pretty freely, let fome words efcape him, that intimated a plot against the tzar. Mentchikof ran in all speed to the palace, requested to reveal a fecret to Peter, and informed him of what he had overheard. The tzar wrapped himfelf in a cloak, and haftened to the houfe pointed out to him by Mentchikof; here, leaning his ear to the door of the room where the people were breakfasting, he distinctly heard what confirmed to him the report of his conductor. He immediately entered and found himfelf in the midst of the conspirators. Whether they imagined that his guards were at the door, or whether they were intimidated at his prefence alone, all of them fell at his knees, and threw themfelves on his clemency. From that moment the tzar took Mentchikof to be about him; and the pye-boy fhortly after became a prince.

The first infurrection occasioned by the general order to all Ruffians to leave off the cuftom of wearing the beard, was followed by the execution. of about eight thousand perfons. For containing fuch a great number of victims, the tzar made choice of a fpacious fquare adjoining to his houfe of Préobrajinsko, three versts from Mosco. The place was furrounded by palifades, through which it was eafy to fee what was paffing within the the inclofure; where, after placing a great number of balks and blocks, the wretches condemned to lofe their lives were made to kneel at them.

Several executioners were immediately employed in cutting off heads. Peter himfelf, with an axe in his hand, fet the example to the executioners. Most of the tzar's courtiers were eager to imitate him; and Mentchikof boafted afterwards that it was he who had cut off the greateft number of heads. A boy about twelve years old came and laid his neck on the tzar's block. The prince, instead of chopping his head off, took him by the arm and shoyed him away. The boy, without faying a word, went and placed himfelf at another block. The tzar, perceiving this, advanced towards him, raifed him up and put him away again. Prefently after the boy returned to fubmit his neck to the axe. The tzar then angrily afked him, why he perfifted in wifhing to have his head cut off? " Thou hast cut off my father's head, my " brother's, and the heads of all my relations, " who were no more guilty than I am," faid the boy; " why fhouldit thou not cut off " mine ?" -- Peter made no answer, but ordered the boy out of the inclosure, threw down his axe, and went away.

That

That prince was not often fo quickly fenfible to his faults. Always athirft for vengeance, he fometimes added treachery to the most atrocious inhumanity. Of this the tragical end of his own fon is 'a melancholy proof. The only crime completely proved against Alexius, was his attempt to efcape from the refertment of his father, by leaving Ruffia without the permiffion of that monarch. The tzar, being apprized that Alexius had abfconded to Naples, fent thither immediately Tolftoï, the bafeft of his ministers, who, by bribes and flatteries, having corrupted the miftrefs who had accompanied the prince in his flight, the unfortunate tzarevitch was induced to return to his father. The tzar at the fame time deceived both the emperor of Germany and the king of Naples, under whofe protection his fon had put himfelf, and who had interceded for him. Notwithstanding the folemn promise he made them to grant him his pardon, he caufed him to be condemned as the greateft of criminals, and put him to death.

This Tolftoï had fpent a part of his youth at Venice. He was the most eloquent and the least fcrupulous man in all Russia. Peter I. having fent him to Constantinople, and remitted to him two hundred thousand ducats in gold to buy over the divan, Tolstoï embezzled a great part part of that fum; and for fear that the fecretary of the embaffy whom he had with him fhould impeach him, he caufed him to be poifoned. Peter I. who well knew the ability and the machiavelianifm of Tolftoï, faid more than once: "Peter Andréyevitch Tolftoï is in all "refpects a very able man: but whoever has "anything to do with him fhould be fure to "have a good large ftone in his pocket, to "knock out his teeth in cafe he fhould be "taken with a fit of biting." In the reign of Peter II. Tolftoï was condemned to be decapitated; but the fentence was changed to banifhment into the government of Archangel, where he died.

When M. Printz was at the court of Peter I. as ambaffador from Pruffia, that prince invited him to a grand entertainment; and after having drank, as ufual, a great deal of wine and brandy, he fent to fetch from the prifons of Peterfburg twenty of the ftrelitzes. Then, at each bumper, he ftruck off the head of one of thefe wretches. He propofed to the pruffian ambaffador to exercife his dexterity upon them; but the ambaffador declined the barbarous offer. What a fpectacle, to fee a tyrant, in the midft of his cups, amufing himfelf with cutting off the heads of a fcore of his unhappy fubjects, M 4. while while his bafe courtiers were getting drunk with him, and applauding the ferocity of fuch fanguinary paftime *!

Endowed with a fine figure and a fuperior underftanding, invefted with fovereign power, and though paffionately fond of women, Peter I. was never beloved by one; or at leaft he was duped by all with whom he formed an attachment. While yet very young he married Evdokhia Lapukhin, who was mother of the unhappy Alexèy. Not long after his marriage with Evdokhia, the tzar fell defperately in love with Anna Moëns, a handfome Fleming, the daughter of a brewer fettled at Mofco.

* This anecdote, though not mentioned by Voltaire in his hiftory, was well known to him, as the king of Pruffia, Frederic II. then prince royal, fent it him, with other accurate memoirs concerning the life of the tzar, and to which Frederic fubjoined : " The tzar had not the flighteft tinc-" ture of humanity, of magnanimity, or of virtue: he had " been brought up in the groffeft ignorance, and only acted " by the impulse of his unruly paffions." In another of his letters, Frederic writes to Voltaire : " The tzar will ap-" pear to you in this hiftory very different from the figure " he makes in your imagination . . . . A concurrence of " fortunate circumflances and favourable events, in con-" junction with the ignorance of foreigners, have trans-" formed the tzar into an heroic phantom, concerning the " grandeur whereof no one has ever thought proper to " doubt."

Evdokhia

Evdokhia at first was apparently grieved at the defertion of her husband: but prefently after confoled herfelf in the fociety of a young boyar, named Glebof; and, to the misfortune both of herfelf and her lover, neglected to make a fufficient fecret of her amour. The tzar, who thought he might be inconftant with impunity, would not allow another to be fo with him. He fhut up the tzaritza in a convent, and afterwards repudiated her in form. His vengeance towards Glebof was far more cruel: he impaled him alive; and it is confidently afferted, that the wretched victim of his fury remained upwards of four-and-twenty hours on the fpike before he expired *.

The tzar went in all eagerness to enjoy this horrible fight. He did more; he got upon the pediment of brickwork in which the pale was fixed, and exhorted the fufferer to confess to him the facts which he had hitherto refused to avow. " Come nearer, that thou mayest hear " me the better," answered Glebof; which the tzar having done, Glebof collected his remaining forces for an inflant, and faid to him : "Thou tyrant, the moft cruel that ever hell "produced, if what thou imputeft to me were "true, thinkeft thou, that, not having con-"feffed it before my punifhment, while yet fome hope remained of obtaining mercy by "the avowal; canft thou think, I fay, that I am fuch a fool or fuch a coward as to fatisfy thee now that it is no longer in thy power to fave my life. Go, horrible monfter," added he, as he fpit in his face; "begone!"

The tzar had ferious thoughts of placing Anna Moëns on the throne. That young woman, who regarded it as the greateft of all misfortunes that her fovereign was fond of her, and to whofe paffion fhe only fubmitted through fear, dextroufly eluded his offers of marriage. Peter, however, continued his vifits to her; but, either difgufted at the coldnefs with which fhe repaid his ardour, or the natural ficklenefs of his temper led him elfewhere, he foon left her to follow her inclinations in marrying a lefs illuftrious lover with whom fhe had long held an amorous correfpondence *.

* Her first husband was Kayzerlinguen, minister from Pruffia to the tzar; after his death she was married to lieutenant-general Balk.

Peter

Peter became enamoured of a young woman of Livonia, who, after having been married to a fwedifh dragoon, is generally reported to have been fucceflively miftrefs to the generals Bauer, Scheremetof, and Mentchikof, became emprefs of Ruffia under the name of Catharine I. *

* A french author, who writes from goood authorities, gives the following account of Catharine. She bore the name of Martha till fhe quitted lutheranifm for the greek religion. She was born in a petty village of Livonia, of poor parents who laboured for their livelihood. While yet very young the was taken by a lutheran clergyman, who lived at Marienburg, named Gluck, to wait upon his daughters. No fooner was the marriageable than the beauty of her figure drew upon her the attention of feveral young men. She had even a fort of intrigue with a Livonian, named Tiezenhaufen, who taught latin at paftor Gluck's; and this latter, on perceiving the forward difpolition of Catharine, married her to a fwedish dragoon, by whom she was courted. The dragoon and his wife were shortly after made prifoners by a party of Ruffians; and, as at that time prifoners of war were treated as flaves, Catharine was conducted to general Bauer, who very foon made a prefent of her to Scheremetof. Scheremetof refigned her to Mentchikof; and, at the end of two years, the tzar having accidentally feen her, took her away from Mentchikof. It is affirmed by fome writers, that the hufband of Catharine had been fent to Siberia: others pretend that he lived many years at Riga upon a penfion that was fecretly conveyed to him.

Though Catharine owed every thing to the tzar, who had feated her on the throne, fhe was not always fo faithful to him as he had a right to expect. Catharine had chosen for her chamberlain the young Moëns de la Croix, whofe fifter, madame Balk, was about her perfon, and had, as we have just now feen, rejected the hand of the tzar. Moëns being of a handfome figure, it was not long before he made a lively impression on the heart of the empres, and the intercourfe was foon perceived by count Yagujinfky, who was then in full confidence with the tzar, and had the cruelty to communicate the difcovery he had made to his mafter. Peter's jealoufy took fire. He vowed vengeance ; but refolved first to convince himfelf by ocular proof of Catharine's treachery. Accordingly, he pretended to leave Petersburg in order to pafs a few days at one of his country-palaces, but repaired fecretly to the winter-palace; then fent a page, on whom he could depend, with his compliments to the emprefs, and to tell her that he was at Strelna, a few leagues from the refidence.

The page, who had orders to take notice of everything, haftened back with a ftrong confirmation of the tzar's fulpicions. Peter went in all hafte to Catharine, and furprifed her in the the arms of her lover. It was two o'clock in the morning, and madame Balk was watching at fome diftance from the apartment of her majefty. Peter, in his fury, overfet a page who ftood in his way, and ftruck Catharine with his cane; but faid not a word to Moëns, or to madame Balk, intending to punifh them in a manner more fevere than by fome ftrokes of his cane.

On leaving Catharine, Peter, ftill in a tranfport of rage, ran abruptly into the chamber where prince Repnin was afleep *, who, ftarting up, and feeing the tzar, thought himfelf undone. "Get up," faid the tzar, "and hear me. Thou "haft no need to drefs." Repnin rofe, trembling at every joint. Peter related to him what had happened, and added : "I am determined "to cut off the emprefs's head as foon as it is "day-light." — "You have fuftained an in-"jury, and you are abfolute mafter," anfwered Repnin; "but permit me, with due refpect, to "make one obfervation. Why divulge the fatal "adventure at which you are fo much irritated ? "You have been forced to deftroy the ftrelitzes.

* Prince Repnin has often related these particulars. He was the grandfather of prince Nicholas Repnin who was fome years ago ambassador at Warfaw and governor of Livonia.

" Almoft

" Almost every year of your reign has been marked by bloody executions. You thought it behoved you to condemn your own fon to death. If you cut off the head of your wife, you will tarnish forever the glory of your name; Europe will behold you in no other light than as a prince greedy of the blood of your fubjects, and of all your kindred. Revenge the outrage; put Moëns to death by the fword of the law. But as to the empress, your best way will be to get rid of her by means that will not fully your fame."

During this fpeech Peter was violently agitated. After fixing his eyes for fome moments on Repnin, he left the room without uttering a word. The ruin of Moëns was already refolved. He was arrefted as well as madame Balk. They were both confined in the winter-palace, in an apartment where none had admiffion, except the emperor himfelf, who carried them their victuals. At the fame time a report was fpread, that the brother and the fifter had been bribed by the enemies of the country, in hopes of bringing the emprefs to act upon the mind of the tzar prejudicially to the interefts of Ruffia.

Moëns was interrogated by the monarch in prefence of general Ufchakof; and, after having confeffed confessed whatever they pleased, he lost his head on the block *.

Madame Balk, his fifter, received the knoot; and it is pretended that it was the tzar himfelf who inflicted it on her: after this fhe was fent into Siberia.

Moëns walked to meet his fate with manly firmnefs. He always wore a diamond bracelet, to which was a miniature of Catharine; but, as it was not perceived at the time of his being feized, he found means to conceal it under his garter; and when he was on the fcaffold he confided this fecret to the lutheran paftor who accompanied him, and under cover of his cloak flipped the bracelet into his hand to reftore it to the emprefs.

The tzar was a fpectator of the punifhment of Moëns from one of the windows of the fenate. The execution being over, he got up on the fcaffold, took the head of Moëns by the hair, and expressed with a brutal energy how delighted he was with the vengance he had taken. The fame day, that prince had the cruelty to conduct Catharine in an open carriage round the flake on which was fixed the head of the unfortunate fufferer. Catharine was fufficiently mistress of herself not to change countenance at the fight of this terrible object; but it is faid, that on returning to her apartment she shed abundance of tears *.

Nor only the internal frame and conflictution of the ruffian empire received from the hand of Peter a great and almost general reform, but even its relation to the reft of the european, particularly the northern flates, was now, in comparifon with former times, entirely changed. Sweden and Poland, lately the formidable foes and neighbours of the empire, faw themfelves now weakened and humbled by Ruffia, and the former even despoiled of a great part of her poffessions. Russia became, in the space of a few years, fo powerful as to be the most dangerous neighbour to both. The ottoman empire, at the clofe of the foregoing century, had already beheld the effects of Peter's enterprifing fpirit, and did not dare to violate the treaty to which the tzar had been compelled by adverse circumftances to accede at Pruth, though infligated to the breach of it by the earnest folicitations of Charles XII. or to oppose, by force of arms, the conquests of the Russians in Persia. Peter had thus, therefore, raifed his country to a pitch of eminence, which the neighbouring kingdoms faw with jealoufy, and that within the fhort period of not quite thirty years. Yet all his labours might have been rendered altogether vain, all his undertakings and their important confequences have been entirely frustrated, unlefs his fucceffors fhould profecute the edifice of which the foundations were laid by him. Nothing more was requifite than that the fucceeding fovereigns fhould tread in Peter's footsteps for producing the effect, that the confequence to which the tzar had raifed the empire fhould not only be undiminished, but even the circumference of it from time to time confiderably increased; and that at prefent, at the close of the eighteenth century, Ruffia's importance in the political scale of Europe, is not only as great, but much greater than that which Peter endeavoured to procure it, and to which, a hundred years ago, he made the beginning by his fuccefsful war against the Turks. It is very remarkable and fingular, that Peter's fyftem of policy was preferved, profecuted and enlarged, VOL. II. under N under the government of women; for his two fucceffors who bore his name, fat not long upon the ruffian throne.

The modern hiftory of Ruffia is also principally marked by feveral revolutions, and thefe revolutions are again extremely different from events of that nature in the hiftory of other countries. In other countries these great changes have been attended with bloodfhed and civil wars; but in Ruffia they were all the work of one night or one day. The nation at large took little or no fhare at all in them; the court and the great men alone feem to have been anyways concerned; and the foldiers, efpecially the GUARDS, were always the principal actors. Now, though thefe revolutions in the throne produced no alterations in the body of the empire, yet I have thought it not proper transfently to pass them over, not only because it is in the nature of man to take an interest in the fate of those who stand so high as fovereigns, particularly if it have any thing unufual in it; but likewife becaufe the fludents of hiftory may form conclusions from fuch events concerning the character of the nation as well as of the fpirit of the government.

• Peter died of a painful difeafe in 1725, without having appointed a fucceffor, as he had a 9 right right to do in virtue of the law of fucceffion enacted by himfelf and ratified by the oath of his fubjects. It feemed now to reft entirely on the nation, or its chiefs, to fupply the vacancy of the throne, as the great men in Ruffia had constantly afferted their influence on the fucceffion of their monarchs. Accordingly; on this occasion feveral plans were framed concerning the fucceffion. The principal perforages had taken every poffible precaution to have the emperor's death immediately announced to them; having, during the laft days of his life, caufed one of their fervants to wait in the imperial palace, in order to have notice of the event the inftant it should happen. It was foreseen that Mentchikof would employ every effort to raife Catharine, the tzar's fecond confort, to the throne, that, in quality of her favourite, he might rule the helm of the ftate; but this Mentchikof was fpurned at by most of the great men on account of his humble origin, and hated for his unbounded arrogance and avarice \*. It was therefore \* Mentchikof was led by his avarice to frequent embezzlements and to commit many acts of opprefilion and injuffice, which the tzar punifhed as well as he could by beating him heartily with his flick : but notwithflanding this he retained him in his employments. Peter I. when  $N \not a$  angry fore the wifh of thefe to remove both him and Catharine from the government, to affign the latter a convent, and the former Siberia for their abode, to proclaim the young prince Peter emperor, now nineteen years of age, and grandfon of Peter the Great, and during his minority to have the entire management of the adminiftration, to difinifs the foreigners, of whom a great number, favoured by Peter, had been appointed to various flations in all the departments of government, to reftore a variety of cuftoms abolifhed by the tzar, and in that view to repeal many of his ordinances and flatutes. This, I fay, was the wifh of moft of the great men who angry on fimilar occasions with the perfons in office, would fay, that he thought it abfolutely impossible to prevent his countrymen from flriving to cheat; fometimes adding, to a foreigner, " If you want to find a Ruffian of honour and " probity, examine clofely whether he has hair growing in " the palm of his hand; and, if you find none, fay boldly " that he is a rafeal." — Peter I. at his death was only 53 years old. It is generally faid that he died of a fupprefilion of urine. Voltaire affirms, that he was defirous to make a will, but that he was unable either to write or to dictate. The manufeript memoirs of Magnau, on the contrary, inform us, that it is highly probable that he actually made that will; but, as it was agreeable neither to the tzaritza nor to Mentchikof, they came to the refolution to fupprefs it.

conceived they had a right to fpeak their opinion on the fubject of filling the vacant throne. It is probable, likewife, that this plan might have been brought to bear, if the authors and abettors of it had not been reftrained by the exceflive awe which all men had for Peter, while he breathed, from taking the finalleft ftep to the execution of this project; being apprehenfive, that if he should recover, and be informed of the defign, they might be punished in his ufual fevere and inexorable manner. So much the more artful were the measures purfued by Mentchikof and his adherents for fecuring the fucceffion to Catharine. The clergy and the foldiers were all that were neceffary to be gained by them for promifing themfelves the defired fuccefs; and thefe were gained - by money, for Mentchikof had wifely in time availed himfelf of the opportunity of getting poffeffion of the imperial treasure. Catharine likewife had, the day before Peter's death, an interview with Mentchikof and fome other men in power, at which they promifed her every affiftance in her undertaking.

Immediately on the death of the tzar the great men of the nation affembled in the imperial palace at Peterfburg; and fcarcely were they met than Catharine appeared, with Ment-chikof, the duke of Holftein, and fome others in her train, and propofed herfelf as EMPRESS. Indeed she presently after withdrew, in order, as was faid, to give the affembled nobles time to deliberate on the legitimacy of her claim to the throne; when much was faid on the circumfance that Peter had left no will, and therefore that they might proceed to an election. But a part of the affembly, and particularly the heads of the clergy, had been won over; another part complied with the propofal from fear *; and against the few who opposed it an appeal was made to the oral declaration of the late tzar, by which it was pretended, that he affirmed that he had caufed Catharine to be folemnly crowned only that fhe might hereafter fucceed to the government. At length Mentchikof interrupted the confultation by a word of command, at which the guards, whofe concurrence had been for the greater part fecured, for which no money had been fpared, marched out, exclaiming : Long live our empress Catharine. During which the prefented herfelf at the window to the populace; and now there was not one of the whole affembly who would have dared to fhew any oppofition in her prefence. She was therefore declared emprefs; on which fhe promifed to be the mother of the country, as Peter had been the father; and Mentchikof, to the great mortification of many of the nobles, who wifhed themfelves in his place, had the fatisfaction to fee his project crowned with fuccefs *. Thus, for the first time, fince Olga, who reigned in the tenth century, a woman fat upon the throne of Ruffia, a woman of obfcure defcent, by the most fingular turns of fortune, raifed to the exalted rank of an unlimited fovereign †.

* According to field-marshal Munich's account, Mentchikof, at the head of the guards, burst into the hall where the fenators were sitting with the doors locked, confulting about the fuccession, and ordered Catharine to be proclaimed empress.

† Mentchikof at first shared the fovereign power which he had obtained for her with the empress; and it is a very striking circumstance, that in a period justly styled an enlightened age, the two perfonages at the head of the most extensive empire of the world could neither write nor read. The artful and treacherous Tolstoï managed almost all the affairs of the ruffian cabinet.

various and contradictory accounts of it would of themfelves compofe a volume; as even the year and place of her birth are not accurately afcertained *. Only thus much is extremely probable, that fhe was born a Livonian, and fprung from vulgar parents +, that fhe loft them when very young, was afterwards taken into the house of the provost Gluck at Marienburg, where the ferved as houfemaid and nurfe to the children, got acquainted with a foldier, with whom the was foon after married. But whether this foldier was obliged on the very wedding-day to join his regiment and make an abrupt departure, as the Ruflians were every day more clofely invefting Marienburg as enemies, and confequently whether Catharine as a bride fell into the hands of the conquerors, or whether fhe had already lived fome time in wedlock, remains equally undecided. More authentic, however, is the account, that, after the conqueft of Marienburg by the Ruffians, the provoft Gluck prefented himfelf to the ruffian general Scheremetof, the first in command, to befeech him to mitigate the calamities that threatened the town. Catharine was in company with Gluck, and by her beauty attracted the general's notice, who immediately took her with him home, furnished her with better cloaths, and treated her with great kindnefs. Mentchikof, who here faw Catharine, by his authority appropriated this part of the fpoil to himfelf: but he enjoyed her not long. Peter, who happened once to fee the fair stranger at Mentchikof's, was fo ftruck with her, that he took her to himfelf, forbade Mentchikof to have any farther intimacy with her, gave her fervants to attend her, and conferred on her the title "her grace." She was now baptized into the ruffian church *, and was highly pleafed with her new fituation, made it her principal bufinefs to ftudy Peter's character, that his love for her increafed from day to day. She likewife frequently bleffed Peter with children; and it is probable that he privately married her in 1707, but first publicly declared her to be his wife in 1711, inftituted an order of knighthood in her honour, appointed her a coronation with pompous ceremonies in 1724, and with his own hands placed the crown upon her head *. Such were the fortunes of this extraordinary woman. Catharine, as a fruitful mother, by fharing all dangers with the tzar, accompanying him on his travels, as in his fecond journey to Holland, and even attending him in war, taking the tendereft care of his health, which was none of the ftrongeft, never betraying any fymptoms of jealouly when other ladies were found amiable: in fhort, by gaining a thorough knowledge of his character, and bearing with his humours, by never meddling with government affairs, only defirous of being wife and mother, fecured to her Peter's affection as long as he lived; and it is by no means improbable, that Peter himfelf, if he had been granted a longer life, would have declared her for his fucceffor. The generality of the nation found not the least impropriety in Catharine's acceding to the vacant throne, as fhe had been Peter's wife for many years, and had been folemnly crowned emprefs. By a condefcending, mild, and obliging deport-

* By fome accounts fhe was born in 1682, by others later, and even not till 1689.

The foldiers were particularly her friends, from her having been prefent in fo many campaigns, from her having had a confiderable hand in making the peace which the army, furrounded near the Pruth, obtained of the grand vizir, and having been the phyfician and faviour of great numbers of the wounded. Accordingly, the foldiers, on receiving the tidings of Peter's death, one and all cried out, If, however, our father be dead, our mother is still alive. Indeed, discontented perfons were not wanting, who faw with extreme diflike, that a woman of fuch vulgar descent, who was not even a native Ruffian, had afcended the throne; yet the diffatisfaction of numbers of the great arole lefs from diflike to Catharine than from hatred to Mentchikof.

deed, during the reign of this empress, the greatest respect, which was only in some degree lessened by the duke of Holstein.

CATHARINE, from the very commencement of her reign, conducted herfelf with the greateft benignity and gentlenefs, whereby fhe fecured to herfelf ftill more the love and veneration of the generality of her fubjects. She reduced the annual capitation-tax by one eighth, ordered the gibbets to be cut down which had been erected by Peter in great numbers throughout the country, had the bodies of the numerous perfons he had executed, ftill lying unburied, interred; recalled the greater part of thofe who had in the late reign been banifhed to Siberia *, paid the troops their arrears, reftored to the Kozaks feveral of their privileges and immunities which had been wrefted from them by Peter, and made no changes among the officers of state. She thus attached to her the people, the army, and even most of the great families of the nation *. The attempts of two impostors, who feverally gave themfelves out for Peter's unfortunate fon Alexey, were fpeedily defeated, and the pretenders to the throne beheaded. The empire enjoyed during her reign the bleffing of peace, which it had fcarcely ever been able to do under Peter. But in the enjoyment of peace, neither the army nor the navy were neglected; on the contrary, both were put in the best condition f; and it was fettled by treaty entered into by the government [1726] with the german emperor, that, in cafe of an attack, they fhould reciprocally affift one another with an army of 30,000.

* Catharine, however, who, during Peter's lifetime, had fhewn fo much courage, activity, and ardour, in the greateft enterprifes, foon difdained to trouble herfelf with public bufinefs, and gave herfelf up entirely to luxury and pleafure. She took on at once two new favourites, the young prince Sapieha, and a livonian gentleman named Lœwenwolden. Thefe two rivals equally firove to pleafe her, and alternately received proofs of her tendernefs, without fuffering their happinefs to be interrupted by the interference of jealoufy.

men, and each of them guarantee the territories of either. The particular motive to thefe engagements was the defire that Catharine had of affifting her fon-in-law the duke of Holftein *; who lived in Ruffia, abfent from his dominions; which Denmark had appropriated to itfelf, to the poffeffion of his duchy of Schlefvig, to which Peter had already flown an inclination. Catharine, therefore, made the moft urgent remonftrances to the danifh court, ordered a fleet to be got ready †; and on the failure of all her

* He had married the princefs Anne, Catharine's daughter. Of this marriage between the duke of Holftein and Anna Petrovna was born, February 21, 1728, the unfortunate Peter III. whom the duke's enemies for a long time called no otherwife than the fon of the duchefs of Holflein. Colonel Brummer was the first tutor of this prince, and accompanied him to Ruffia in the reign of Elizabeth.

† The tzaritza issued orders to equip a formidable armament, for the purpole of forcing the king of Denmark to give fatisfaction to the duke of Holftein, in regard to Schlefvig. All at once the flore-houfes of the navy, and a great number of gallies appointed to convey the troops that were ready to embark, were confumed by fire. It was faid, that Mentchikof, in concert with admiral Apraxin, had fet them in flames, to revenge themfelves on the duke of Holftein. It is true that the Danes were likewife accufed of it. Shortly after, an englifh fleet and a danifh fquadron appeared, one before Reval, and the other before Cronftadt; fpreading alarm even to Peterfburg.

remonstrances, seemed determined to support the demands of the duke of Holstein with all the power of a ruffian empress. The nation and the senate, however, shewed but little disposition to engage in an expensive war with Denmark, and her allies, England and France, on account of the claims of a prince connected with the reigning family only by marriage, in support of a german duke. The dispute was regarded as a private concern; and Catharine died without a shot being fired in favour of her fon-in-law.

Uncertain as it is when and where Catharine came into the world, not lefs undecided is it whether fhe went out of it in a natural way. Some hiftorians affirm that fhe was poifoned, which occafioned her to linger fome time, and at length brought her to the grave. Others on good reafons deny this affertion, while they allow that fhe injured herfelf by her manner of life, particularly by drunkennefs, to which fhe might have been feduced by her hufband's example, and from complaifance to him; and thus, as well as by the fingular cuftom of paffing whole nights in walking out and driving in fledges, undermined her health, and ruined her conftitution. She died the 17th of May, 1727.

Previous to her death fhe was perfuaded to make her will; the main point of which, concerning cerning the fucceffion, was, that Peter Alexievitch * fhould be her fucceffor, and, till he attained his fixteenth year, to be under the tutelage of the princeffes Anna and Elizabeth, the duke of Holftein, and the other members of the council †, making provision alfo for the cafualty of the young emperor's dying without heirs. A fecond article of the will was, that the regency fhould endeavour to bring about a marriage between the young emperor and a daughter of prince Mentchikof. The will, moreover, even contained feveral proofs of Catharine's concern for her fon-in-law the duke of Holftein.

The bounds of the empire were alfo enlarged under Catharine, by the homage paid her by the kubinfkian Tartars, and the fubmiffion of a georgian prince to Ruffia.

That Catharine, notwithftanding fhe could neither write nor read, had a great natural underftanding, a very high degree of prudence, and a perfectly found judgment, is manifest from the whole tenor of her reign. Yet, perhaps, if she had lived longer, that would have happened which has often been afferted, namely, that fhe would have been detruded from the throne. At leaft, there was never wanting a great number of malcontents all the while fhe reigned. The impenetrable veil of obfcurity that concealed her origin, the hiftory of her earlier days, ere she was acknowledged by Peter as his wife, were a flumbling-block to many; and papers were frequently handed about, in which fhe was very irreverently mentioned. Already, in the fecond year of her reign, she felt herself under the neceffity of threatening to punish with death all fuch as should speak of her family in difrespectful terms *. The following judgment, therefore, passed upon her by a german author of that time, who was well informed of the circumstances of Catharine's life, feems accurately to fuit " The gratitude and kindnefs," fays he, her.

* All at once arrived at Peterfburg a brother of Catharine, whom fhe ordered to take the name of count Skavronfky. He brought with him his wife and three children. What made this circumftance the more aftonifhing was, that it had always been believed that the emprefs had no knowledge of any of her relations. His children were two boys and a girl. The emprefs married the latter to her favourite Sapieha. Several authors have mentioned that the tzar knew the brother of Catharine; but, according to the manufcript memoirs already often cited, this is a miftake.

The fucceffion and the marriage of Peter II. ‡ with Mentchikof's daughter, were the two fole items of Catharine's will which Mentchikof was anxious to execute. Indeed, numbers of the great would have been glad to fee Peter deprived of the fucceffion, partly becaufe it was highly probable that Mentchikof would continue to act the fame part under the new monarch which he had begun under the former, partly becaufe they were afraid that Peter II. would make his refentment fall heavy on thofe who had affented to the fentence of death paffed on his father. fo much prudence, that the imperial heir, now twelve years old, immediately received homage as emperor. If, while Peter I. was alive, he ftood close by the throne, and had a great influence in the government during the reign of Catharine, as his fphere of operation was only fomewhat bounded by the duke of Holftein, ftill greater opportunities now prefented themfelves to him of having the entire management of the administration during the emperor's minority, as the expected marriage of his daughter with the young monarch would probably place him and his family for ever in clofe relationship with the reigning houfe. The most fanguine wishes could require no more. He even thought himfelf fo fure of his bufinefs, that he now threw off all reftraint, and in his whole behaviour shewed himfelf as already the father-in-law of the emperor. In order to have the prince conflantly about him, to conduct him abfolutely by his will, and in the monarch of the empire to form to himfelf an obedient fon-in-law, he took him home to his manfion. No one feemed able or bold enough to oppofe in the finalleft degree what Mentchikof did and refolved to do. But he flood not long on this pinnacle of power. Just when he thought himfelf most fecure, the 02 hour hour of his fall arrived *. Several of the first families of the empire had ever viewed his profperity with envious eyes; and as Mentchikof's pride and arrogance constantly kept pace with his advancement, as he exercised his power with the most absolute despotism, the number and the hatred of his enemies increased in an equal degree.

* The duke of Holftein and his minister were not the fole enemies of Mentchikof: he had a great number of fuch as were implacable and fecret, among whom was Oftermann, the most assiduous of his flatterers. Ostermann, born in Westphalia, the fou of a lutheran pastor, had acquired the confidence of Peter 1. and arrived at the high post of vice-chancellor; but, although he had time enough to accustom himfelf to the manners of the Russians, he could never forgive Mentchikof for addreffing him always in an arrogant and fupercilious tone, and often threatening him with the knoot, and with Siberia. Being refolved to have his revenge, he had feized the favourable moment for prompting the favourite to take the imprudent flep that accelerated his downfall, that of declaring the young grandduke heir of the empire, to prevent the duke of Holftein from acceding to the erown on the death of the tzaritza. Oftermann had been fecretary to count Shafirof, the moft able minister of Peter I. He had the ingratitude to cabal against Shafirof, and to cause his difinistion ; as he likewife procured that of marshal Munich. In short, in 1741 Elizabeth banished Oftermann to the borders of the Frozenoccan, and there he died in 1747. Ilis fon was vicechancellor under Catharine II.

Attempts

Attempts had often been made, but in vain, to work his downfall : they now fucceeded *. A youth of one of the moft refpectable families of the empire, Ivan Dolgoruki, the daily companion of the young emperor, very foon found an opportunity to inftil prejudices against Mentchikof in the mind of Peter, by representing to him that this man was allowed to affume too much of the monarch, the latter having properly no will of his own, but was entirely ruled by that of * The chiefs of the party were Tolftoï, Butturlin, and the count de Vier, a portugueze adventurer, made minister of police in Ruffia, and brother-in-law to Mentchikof, much against his will. The count de Vier, more known in Russia under the name of Antone Manuelovitch, was midshipman on board of a merchant-ship when Peter I. took him into his fervice. That prince placed him afterwards at the head of the department of police, in which post de Vier acquired great reputation. It was not fafe to travel in any part of Ruffia, except by caravans, the roads were fo infefted by robbers, often protected by the lords of the domain. De Vier found means of repreffing thefe diforders; in reward for which fervice Peter I. gave him the title of count, and made him marry the fifter of Mentchikof. The fecret meetings of the party were held at the house of a Piémontese, named count Santi. This count Santi had been involved in France in the confpiracy of the prince of Cellamare. Being thrown into the baftile, whence he had the dexterity to escape, he went over to Russia, and there became master of the ceremonies at court.

Mentchikof.

Mentchikof. Dolgoruki's infinuations operated with the speedier effect, as Peter felt no fondness for Maria Mentchikof, who was defigned to be his bride, and openly confeffed that he wished to be rid of her. Mentchikof, who had happily outftood even the boifterous temper of Peter the Great, had been all-powerful under Catharine, notwithstanding the duke of Holstein's machinations against him, and was afterwards the austere and imperious father-in-law of Peter II. was now overthrown, and obliged with his whole family, of which even the betrothed wife of the young emperor formed a part, to depart for Berefof in Siberia*, 1727. By this ftroke of fortune all his plans of greatness were at once defeated, and the treafures he had accumulated † poured into the imperial coffers, from which the greater part had been furreptitioufly taken.

The family of Dolgoruki now took the place of the degraded favourite; and fo completely, that even a young lady of that houfe was felected to be the young Peter's bride inftead of Maria Mentchikof, who was forced to fhare in her father's lamentable fate, and from the expectation of afcending the greateft throne in the world, was plunged in the deepeft diffrefs. Catharine Dolgoruki made fo ftrong an imprefilion on Peter the very first time he faw her, that he afked her hand of her father, and Catharine was foon after publicly affianced to the emperor.

The coronation was fixed for the beginning of the year 1728, and Peter travelled from Petersburg to Mosco for that purpose. Mosco and the adjacent country, which he frequently traversed on the hunting parties, with which the Dolgorukies amused him, pleased him so much, that he had an intention to transfer the residence hither from Petersburg: a design by which he attached to him all the Russians of the old ftamp, who had an antipathy to the new city, the building whereof had been very burdenfome to them, and by its becoming the refidence had detracted much from Mofco.

PETER was much beloved by the nation in general; and at first he greatly raifed their expectations. His capacities were indeed far above the ordinary level; Catharine I. had taken as much care of his education as if he had been her fon; and Oftermann drew up a plan for the conduct of it *, which, as is the cafe with all

* It will be worth while to infert here fome particulars of this plan. Oftermann made it a main concern, and to be kept conftantly in view, that it was a reigning fovereign to be inftructed. National hiftories, politics, legiflation, functions of the magistrate, the rights of nations in war and peace, as well as the military art itfelf, were the main objects of this inftruction ; together with which, mathematics, natural knowledge, &c. were to be taught: the leffons were to be rather in the didactic method, that the emperor might be fpared much reading and writing. - For the religious part of his education Theophanes laid down the plan; and it is indeed more excellent than could have been expected of those times. " Let the being of God," he fays, " be proved to the emperor from the existence of the creatures, the foul, the confeience; and the neceffity of a life after death from the divine justice, as the fortunes of men in this world cannot always be made fuitable to their actions. Let at least as much attention be paid to the duties of life as to the dogmas of faith."

plans and projects of this nature, if in many refpects it had been but half executed, Peter must have been modelled into one of the most active, enlightened, and best fovereigns that ever added luftre to a diadem. It must be freely confeffed, however, that it was not the intention of those who wanted to have a hand in the bufinefs, especially the Dolgorukies, to make of him a fovereign who faw with his own eyes and was guided by his own fentiments. Their aim was to draw off the young monarch from the ferious affairs of his station; and they fucceeded in their endeavours, by infpiring him with an immoderate paffion for the fports of the field. Peter frequently fuffered many days to pafs fucceffively without ever being feen in Mofco, but was continually at one or the other of his hunting-feats; and his eagerness for this pastime was increasing from day to day. It is eafily conceivable that this frequent and violent exercife was not propitious to the health of the young emperor, his bodily ftrength not being yet arrived at maturity, that it weakened him too much, and was the caufe that the difeafe by which he was attacked brought on the diffolution of his frame *. With him was extinct the male race of the family Romanof, with him the faireft hope of the nation, the hope of hereafter being governed by a wife and benign fovereign *, for which in reality he difcovered particular difpofitions, funk into the grave. — All Ruffia fince has termed his reign its happieft period for a hundred years. No war with any neighbouring country, during his reign, wafted its men and money. Every one might quietly and fecurely enjoy what belonged to him. Mofco particularly had great expectations from this reign, as Peter feemed fo much difpofed to make this refidence of the ancient tzars the place of his abode. But whether his predilection for Molco and his indifference to Petersburg might not perhaps have occasioned under his government lefs attention to have been had to the fleet and maritime affairs with which Peterfburg was fo clofely connected, and whether the national confequence which Ruffia now maintained among the states of Europe might not thus have been loft, was much to be dreaded, fince both the army and navy are faid to have been fenfibly affected by the emperor's absence. It was likewise easy to foresee that the influence and importance of foreigners, which had rifen very high in Ruffia from the time of Peter the Great, would have greatly diminished under Peter II. Peter himself was indeed by no means indifpofed towards foreigners; he promifed feveral advantages to fuch as were willing to come to Ruffia; but the native Ruffians, in conjunction with the Dolgorukies, would, by infenfible degrees, have wrought an alteration in his mind, and have infpired him with a stronger partiality for the russian nation, and for ruffian manners: for the great of the old ruffian families always regarded with jealoufy the authority which fome of the foreigners had acquired in the country.

" might tempt one to think they intended to kill him." A ukafe that appeared in 1739 in express terms charges the Dolgorukies with having undermined the young emperor's conflictution by the fatigues of hunting.

* The day after his acceffion to the throne he wrote to his fifter : " It having pleafed God to call me in my tender " youth to be emperor of all Ruffia, my principal care fhall " be to acquire the reputation of a good fovereign, by " governing my people in righteoufnefs and in the fear of " God, by hearkening to the complaints of the poor aud " innocent under oppreffion that fly to me for refuge, by " granting them relief; and, after the laudable example " of Vefpafian, letting no man go forrowful from me." What a happinefs for Ruffia, if this emperor, always thinking and acting in this manner, had attained to an extreme old age !

The

The Dolgoruki family would undoubtedly have entirely guided the helm of ftate, if they had once fully effected the projected union with the reigning prince by the marriage of Catharine with Peter. But their hopes and fchemes were prefently defeated by the premature death of the monarch. Indeed, after that event the young Dolgoruki made one more attempt to enfure to himfelf and his family the influence on the affairs of the empire. He had forged a testament, which he pretended to be the last will of Peter II., in which the Catharine Dolgoruka, betrothed to Peter, was declared fucceffor. With his fword drawn he left the imperial chamber, proceeded to the hall, where the great men were affembled, and exclaimed : Long live the empress Dolgoruka - but, finding that no one joined him, he fneathed his fword, and - concealed the testament. Even his father, on feeing that Ivan had fetched a party of the guards to him, in the hope of effectuating his defign, called it a foolifh trick, and fent him home.

This teftament, therefore, being declared invalid, the fucceffion to the throne was to be decided by that flill extant of Catharine I. and not annulled by Peter II. In this it was ordained that, in cafe Peter flould die without heirs, heirs, Anne Duchefs of Holftein, and her pofterity; on failure of them the prince's Elizabeth * and her posterity should fucceed. Anne, indeed, had been dead ever fince 1728, but had left behind her a prince. He therefore would be now, according to the purport of that will, the legitimate heir. But the duke of Holftein and his confort had fhortly after Catharine's death thought fit to take their leave of Ruffia, where Mentchikof rendered their abode extremely irkfome, and return to their poffefiions of Holftein-Gottorp in Germany; and the council, which on Peter the fecond's death directed the fucceffion and was averfe to foreigners, would have paid no regard to the young prince of Holftein, even if his father had been still in Ruffia, much lefs was any notice taken of him now that he lived in Germany †. - Next to Anne

Anne and her posterity, by Catharine's last will, the princess Elizabeth was to fucceed: but that princess remained entirely inactive on the vacancy of the throne, though her physician Lestocq took all possible pains to perfuade her to put in her claim to the fuccession. It had hitherto been her fole defire to live at her ease, exempt from all concern in the affairs of government, and only to purfue her pleafures.

The council, the fenate, the general officers, and other perfons of diffinction had affembled immediately on the demife of the emperor, in order to confult on the proper measures to be taken in regard to the fucceflion. On this occafion no notice at all was taken of Catharine's testament. The council proceeded to appoint an election. The eldeft fifter was not agreeable to them on account of her having a foreign and turbulent prince to her hufband; and therefore the fecond, ANNA IVANOVNA, dowager duchefs of Courland, was nominated emprefs of Ruffia.

In the meantime, though the hopes of the Dolgorukies of getting the government into their hands under Peter had proved abortive, they neverthelefs continued to form a powerful party in the council and in the fenate, as the chief counfellors of the empire, and were therefore ftriving to procure themfelves an influence during the future reign. As now not only they but feveral other of the great nobles viewed with jealoufy the refpect in which foreigners were held; and apprehending, moreover, that they might retain their confequence likewife in Anna's reign, a plan was formed to tie up the hands of the future fovereign: by a capitulation, that all things now might proceed according to the inclination of the council, and the fovereign be in a manner merely the executrix of its refolutions, the fitting was clofed. "The general welfare," faid Galitzin in a fpeech delivered on the occafion to the affembly, " requires that the fupreme au-" thority, and the unlimited power of the fove-" reign, by which Ruflia has hitherto fuffered " fo much, and which is fupported by the fo-" reigners that are brought in, fhould be cir-" cumferibed, and that the crown fhould be " conferred upon the new fovereign Anna only " under certain conditions."

His propofal was received with approbation; and the following conditions were agreed to: "The high privy council continues, and the "new emprefs governs folely by its refolves; "fhe cannot of her own motion either wage "war or make peace; cannot of herfelf lay any "new tax on the people; cannot alone difpofe of any important office; cannot inflict capital "punifhment on any nobleman or confifcate his eftates, unlefs he be convicted of the crime laid to his charge; cannot arbitrarily give away and alienate any lands pertaining "to the crown; cannot marry or nominate an "heir,

" heir, without first obtaining the confent of the " council." — To these this singular article was added, that Anne should bring her favourite, the chamberlain von Biren, with her into Russia.

By this means, therefore, a great revolution in the form of government in Ruflia was intended. The authority of the ruflian fovereigns hitherto perfectly abfolute was to be exceedingly diminifhed and confined. Ruflia's ruler, fo far from being famoderjets or autocrator, was now to be reduced to a fimple executor of the refolutions of the council, and Ruflia's monarchy converted into an ariflocracy.

An embaffy composed of three members of the council * was dispatched to Mittau to inform the duchefs of her election, and at the fame time of the capitulation annexed. Anne would probably have hesitated at subforbing to the capitulation, and would perhaps have absolutely refused to accept the crown upon such terms, had the not been already made acquainted with them from the account fent her by lieutenantgeneral Yagujinfky. In this meffage he at the fame time advifed her to fign the capitulation for the prefent, and when fhe fhould once be emprefs to revoke what fhe had done, and that he would from that moment take measures accordingly. Tranquilized by this letter, Anne put her fignature to the inftrument, and was declared emprefs. In the mean time the rumour fpread concerning a capitulation propofed to the emprefs, excited no fmall fenfation in the public mind, which the oppofite party exerted themfelves to increafe and to employ to their purpofe. It was reported that the Dolgorukies wifhed to confirm, by this capitulation, the influence they had acquired under Peter II. to the detriment of the nation. The other noble families, who had no relation in the council, were naturally afraid that the government would now pafs into the hands of fome families who would only take care to provide for their relations, whereas it might reafonably be expected. that an unlimited monarch would look chiefly to merit in his promotions, as Peter had allalong done. This argument operated particularly on the guards, among whom were feveral of the country nobles. The nation in general, hitherto.

hitherto accustomed to be ruled by an absolute fovereign, foon made it plainly underflood, that they had rather obey one emperor than eight masters. At length a petition was prefented to the emprefs, figned by feveral hundred noblemen, in which the was prayed to accept of the government in fuch manner as her predeceffors on the ruffian throne had always poffeffed it, to unite the council with the fenate, by being abfolute and unlimited ruler. Anne was never fo much inclined to acquiefce to any petition as to this, which, in fuch complete conformity with her wifhes, promifed to free her from the controul of the council. She therefore ordered the council to be convened; and, in the prefence of those who had prefented the petition, audibly and deliberately read the capitulation, asking at every feparate article: Is this the will of the nation? - No, was unanimoufly anfwered by all who were not members of the council. Upon which Anne tore the act of capitulation to pieces in the face of the whole affembly, faying: " Then there is no farther need of this paper." A manifesto was immediately published, declaring, that the empress ascended the throne of her anceftors, not by election but in virtue of her hereditary right. It had formerly been the practice to promife in the oath of fealty to be P 2 true

Thus Anne in a flort time freed herfelf from the ties in which fhe was intended to be bound †. Biren

† Ottermann had the greateft fhare in annulling the capitulation. Under the pretext of indifposition he negledted to attend the council affembled on Peter's death, . refufed his affent to the capitulation, complimenting at the fame time the great men, by telling them that they beft knew what was for the benefit of the country, while he was exerting every effort to counteract the council, and thus acquired the favour of Anne to a fuperlative degree. — It proved, likewife, of great affiftance to Anne, that the Biren came to the ruffian court, and took poffeffion of the place near her which Mentchikof had filled near Catharine.

The newly erected council, diffinct from the fenate, was now abolifhed, and again a directing fenate appointed, as under Peter the Great. Anne, however, afterwards eftablifhed a cabinet to fuperintend the affairs of greateft importance, confifting of no more than three perfons, and in which Oftermann's voice was of peculiar weight. The fenate had now only to decide upon lefs important matters, and had in fact very little to do.

The election of a king of Poland, a treaty to be concluded with Perfia, and a war with the Turks, were the affairs that occupied Anne in the first years of her reign.

Peter I. had fupported the election of Augustus II. to the crown of Poland; and the Poles experienced already under Anne, that their free choice might henceforth be very much limited by the neighbouring courts, particularly by that of Russia. The partizans of king Staniflaus, who had retreated with him to Danizik, were obliged to fubmit to the Ruflians; Staniflaus himfelf was reduced to the neceffity of faving himfelf by flight, and Ruffia took a decided fuperiority in conducting the election of Augustus. France, who faw with great difpleafure a power arifing in the north of Europe that in time might render doubtful the confequence fhe had hitherto maintained in this quarter of the globe; France, whofe plan to give Poland a king devoted to her interests was now entirely defeated, fought to ftir up a dangerous neighbour to Ruffia in Sweden, and that the influence of France was great at Stockholm has frequently fince been feen.

* In this view Anne fent troops to the Rhine against France — but before they could difplay their courage there a peace was made.

. Peter

Peter the Great, as we have already obferved, had extended the confines of his empire on the fide of Perfia. But it was very foon found that this enlargement of the borders was no fubfrantial acquifition to the country. In the first place, in order to preferve them, it was involved in an expensive and tedious war, and these scenes of devastation must probably be often renewed; fecondly, the newly acquired provinces, even in peace, required a very confiderable garrifon; and, as the climate of those parts did not agree with the Ruffians, a multitude of foldiers were conftantly falling victims to difease *. Anne therefore opened a negotiation with the fhah of Perfia, promifing to reftore to him the conquered countries, if in return he would accord to her fubjects fome advantages to their commerce. They at length came to terms; and Ruffia [1735] made a formal furrender of all her perfian poffeffions, for which the ruffian merchants obtained mercantile privileges to a confiderable extent in the territories belonging to Persia. - On this occasion the empress also concluded a defenfive treaty with the fhah against the Turks, with whom Ruffia was defirous of forming an alliance.

The peace which Peter, when furrounded by the Turks, had been obliged to fign on the borders of the Pruth, the evacuation of Azof, the demolition of the fortifications at Taganrok, by which Ruffia was excluded from all the benefits of trade on the Euxine, the refufal of the porte to grant the imperial title to the monarch of Ruffia, the incurfions of the krimean and other Tartars, acknowledging the turkish supremacy, into the ruffian dominions, in which they ravaged large districts, and carried away many captives into bondage: all these circumstances together had already occafioned Peter to meditate a new war with the porte. In profecution of this defign, he ftrongly fortified the principal places of his empire in the neighbourhood of Turkey, furnished them with provision and military stores, and thus completely armed for war. But he died on the eve of it; and under Catharine L and Peter II. the execution of the plan was no farther attempted. Anne, however, revived the idea; entertaining the greater hopes of fucceeding in this enterprize, as fhe now could rely on 30,000 auxiliaries from the emperor of Germany, and had, befides, drawn the Turks, now, at peace with Ruffia, into a war against Perfia, and and therefore already employed them on that fide.

The Tartars, under the protection and fupremacy of the porte, had recently again given occafion for fresh complaints on the part of Russia, by their predatory inroads upon the ruffian territory, in which they carried off men and cattle. The porte replied with the ordinary excufes, that it was utterly impossible to keep a restraint on these Tartars: an excuse which, indeed, could only be offered by the turkish government; and Ruffia, therefore, thought herfelf justified in chastifing herself this breach of good neighbourhood. In 1735 a ruffian corps marched into the Krim, and ravaging a part of the country, killed a good number of Tartars; but, having ventured too far without a fufficient flock of provisions, were obliged to retreat, and fustained fo great a lofs in men, that what they had accomplished bore no proportion to this misfortune.

However, the almost total failure of this first attempt, which had cost the Russians ten thousand men, by no means deterred that court from adhering to the plan of subduing the Turks and Tartars. Count Munich, afterwards so famous in the modern history of Russian, was appointed to affert the honour of the russian arms against the Turks, who, fince the peace of the Pruth, had had no very favourable opinion of ruffian valour, and to chaftife the Tartars. After he had conquered Dantzik, in quality of field-marfhal, and thereby fecured the crown to Auguftus III. he was fent into the Ukraine with the commiffion to take meafures for chaftifing the piratical Tartars, for their ravages committed on the ruffian territory. From the Ukraine he proceeded [1736] into the peninfula of the Krimea. The Tartars, lefs fitted for fighting in the open field than for predatory excurfions and fudden attacks, fuffered the ruffian troops to advance unmolefted, thinking themfelves fafe behind their entrenchments, denominated the lines of the Krim *, from any

The ditch is of confiderable depth, the height of the ramparts from the bottom of the ditch to the top of the breaftwork is 70 feet, and the breakwork is of proportionable folidity. The Tartars held thefe ramparts, in the construction of whickfome thousand men were employed for feveral years, to be impregnable. Peter had already intended to erect a fimilar line of forts in the Ukraine, against the frequent attacks of the Tartars; but the defign was not completed till'1732. attack attack of the Ruffians. But entrenchments of that kind were unable to refift the impetuofity of ruffian troops. They were furmounted; the Tartars repulfed; and a great part of the Krimea lay at the mercy of the conquerors. In the month of June they entered the krimean fortrefs of Perekop. That the ruffian troops now repaid. the devastations committed by the Tartars in the empire, by defolating and carrying off whatever fell under their power, needs no particular mention. It was not, therefore, furprifing that they found it impossible to remain in a country where those that fied endeavoured to spread defolation as they went, for the fake of difabling their purfuers to overtake them; and where it is usual for the conqueror himfelf, to make the whole of his warfare to confift in plundering, devastation, and spoil. Accordingly, whatever the army was in want of, must be fetched from the Ukraine, which was attended with extreme difficulty; for which reafon, Munich at length found himfelf under the necessity, towards autumn, of withdrawing with his troops by the fhortest way to the Ukraine, in order there, where provisions at least were to be had, to go into winter-quarters, in which, however, they were very frequently infefted by the Tartars. While Munich was in the Krim, endeavouring to

to chastife the Tartars for their depredations, Lafcy had proceeded with another army against Azof for feizing the protecting fovereignty of the Tartars from the paramount Turks. The attack proved fuccefsful; and on the first of July the fort of Azof had already fubmitted to his arms.

The grand vizir had himfelf courteoufly treated the ruffian ambaffador recalled from Conftantinople by his court, and the porte in general wifhed to be able to avoid a war with Ruffia; as Ruffia, however, would not liften to any accommodation, the Turks began to arm, recruited the garrifons in the feveral forts, caufed a fleet to be equipped in the Euxine, and put the army in a proper condition. The porte continued, neverthelefs, to employ every means, even by having recourse to the mediation of Austria, for preferving peace with Russia; but as fhe could not be brought to make voluntary facrifices, the mediation of Auftria proved of no avail, and Ruffia demanded of the latter 30,000 men, as auxiliaries in virtue of the treaty fubfifting between the two powers. Auftria, however, at prefent thought it better to contend with her whole force against the Ottomans, than merely to fend auxiliary troops to the Ruffians, and thereby strengthen their power. She expected in the former cafe that it would be more more eafy for her to conquer fomething from the Turks, whereas in the latter it feemed only furnifhing Ruffia with the means of extending her conquefts. The porte, already apprehenfive that Auftria would fupply its inveterate enemy with auxiliaries, was now thrown into confternation on learning that the former power intended to become a principal in the war, by which fhe had to engage with another adverfary, whofe forces, under the conduct of prince Eugene, had been fo formidable to her only a few years before.

As, however, Ruffia and Auftria fpoke in a lofty tone to the porte, the latter thought it was at any rate better to stake on the fortune of war what her enemies wanted her to furrender to their ambition, than voluntarily make such facrifices as were inconfissent with her honour and safety; and as Rufsia, withal, shewed so little disposition to peace, the porte began to arm for a campaign [1737]; and the Rufsians and Austrians, with combined forces, threatened to shake the ottoman empire.

The ruffian army, having now fupplied the lofs it had fuftained in the former campaign by forty thousand new recruits, undertook, in the course of this year, the conquest of Otchakof, under the orders of count Munich, while the troops commanded by Lafcy entered the Krimea. Otchakof fubmitted, in which a garrifon was placed by the conqueror; the Krim was defolated; and this was all the advantage that accrued from the campaign, for which Ruffia facrificed about fifty thoufand of her veteran troops; and the army was obliged to return to take up its winter-quarters in the Ukraine. Wars that are attended with no alteration in the ftate of nations fhould occupy but a fhort fpace in hiftory. The Ruffians, on all fides victorious, conquerors of Moldavia, mafters of Azof on the Palus Mæotis, and of Otchakof on the Euxine, were glad to purchafe peace by the facrifice of their conquefts.

The great expectations that had been raifed from the united efforts of two fuch empires as Ruffia and Auftria were entirely difappointed. It feems to be ordained, that the ruffian and auftrian arms, in conjunction against one common foe, should perform no mighty deeds. This was confirmed in the turkis war of which we are speaking; it often afterwards proved to be the cafe in the feven years' war, as well as in that which Catharine II. and Joseph II. carried on in alliance against the porte. It must be owned, however, that field-marshal Munich's hatred to Austria contributed in no finall degree to the little fuccels of the auftrian arms in this. conflict, which hindered him from acting on the fame plan with the auftrian generals. Indeed, excepting in the capture of Otchakof, he remained inactive during the whole campaign. Thus the Turks were enabled to prefs with their entire force upon the Auftrians, and even there to break their ranks with the greater eafe, as the commanders were at variance among themfelves, and jealous of each other. The confequence of all this, therefore, was, that the two combined courts presented mutual complaints, each of the generals of the other, and particularly from the cabinet of Vienna accufations were constantly coming forth against Munich. But he as often eafily justified himself to his fovereign, by making it appear to her, that if the campaign had not been attended with any brilliant fuccefs, the blame was due to the auftrian generals. The Turks took advantage of this difunion between the leaders on either fide, as well as of the inactivity thence arifing of the hoftile armies, by gaining various advantages over the Austrians. The turkish foldiery afcribing these, which in truth had their fource in those diffentions, to their own bravery alone, were therefore rifing in fpirits from day to day, and more zealous and active for the continuation of the war. The porte porte recalled the ambaffador whom they had fent to the congress which was to be held at Nemirof in Poland, though at the fame time giving to understand, that they might hearken to terms of pacification with Ruffia, if the would agree, without the concurrence of the emperor, to put all things in their former state, by evacuating Azof, and Otchakof, the conqueits she had made. As Ruffia, however, was not inclined to accede to either the one or the other, the controvers was again left to the decision of arms. Munich, in the ensuing campaign [1738] was affiduous in his marches, convinced the Turks of the superiority of the ruffian troops over theirs; but on the whole effected little.

General Lafcy had again undertaken a hoftile expedition into the Krimea. But here, likewife, no real advantage was gained; men and cattle were harrafled by tedious marches in a ravaged, defolated country, in which numbers of them died by fatigue; the people were even frequently in danger of perifhing with hunger; and, after committing horrible depredations and havoc, were forced to retreat. The rufilan arms did not feem actually tending to fuccefs till the following campaign. [1739.] Marfhal Munich, having drawn the whole army together at Kief, croffed the Bogue, completely routed the Turks in a pitched battle near near Stavutshan, took in August the fortress of Khotyim, paffed over the Pruth, made himself mafter of Yaffy, the capital of Moldavia, and had the fatisfaction of compelling the whole of that territory to fubmit to the empress Anne. Leaving Moldavia, he repaffed the Pruth, and made preparations for the capture of Bender; but, while he was fending difpatches to Peterfburg, with accounts of one victory after another, and all his enterprifes feemed favoured by fortune, circumstances had fuddenly changed. Though Munich's campaign had this time been fo brilliant, and the injury he had done to the Turks by the conquest of the fertile Moldavia so great, that even his foldiers thought themfelves fufficiently paid for the toils of the campaign by pillaging the country, yet little or nothing was atchieved by the auftrian allies. Reciprocal rivalihips among the commanders, and envy at the fuccels of the ruffian arms, frustrated all their enterprifes. In -addition to this, contagious difeafes broke our in the auftrian camp. Moreover, the emperor Charles VI. lay dangeroufly ill, fo that his recovery was doubtful; and his daughter Maria Therefa wifhed for nothing more earneftly, than to fee an end to the turkish war, that peace might be preferved on that fide, fince it was extremely probable that the would thortly have VOL. feveral enemies to encounter. The auftrian chieftains, therefore, made overtures of peace to the Turks; and, contrary to all expectation, the articles agreed on between the porte and Auftria were figned at Belgrade on the firft of September 1739. Every thing remained on the former footing; and the grand expectations which Auftria had entertained from this war, were rendered entirely abortive. Inftead of having made new conquefts, fhe was obliged to reftore Belgrade, her rampart of Hungary againft the Turks, together with almost all the conquefts of the former war, happily terminated under the aufpices of prince Eugene.

With this partial peace, however, the cabinet of Peterfburg was by no means fatisfied; and though Auftria had flipulated that fhe fhould be allowed to give to Ruffia the 30,000 auxiliary troops, as bound by treaty to do; though at prefent there was every appearance that Ruffia might be victorious; yet, as the vizir fhewed a difpofition to enter into a negotiation even with Ruffia, compliance was not refufed on the part of the emprefs; and thus, fo early as the 18th of September, a peace was effected between the court of St. Peterfburg and the porte. Ruffia had facrificed in this war fo great a number of men, and been forced to expend fuch vaft fums

in the profecution of it, that nothing better could be done than to confent to terms of accommodation, especially as the Turks were enabled by the treaty with Austria to direct the whole of their force against Russia. The conditions of peace were, that Azof fhould be evacuated, and, together with its territory, fhould lie wafte and uncultivated, as a boundary between the two empires. Nevertheless, it should be lawful for Russia to build a fortress on the Don, as likewife for the porte to conftruct another in the Kuban. The greater and the lefs Kabardia were likewife to remain unoccupied, as a frontier; both governments agreed, however, to take a certain number of hoftages from the inhabitants of the country, for their greater fecurity that this liberty might not be abused. The Ruffians were not permitted to keep a fleet either in the Palus Mæotis or in the Euxine, and ruffian merchants had licence only to carry on commerce in turkish bottoms in the latter. Not only the Moldau, but likewife all the other conquests that had been made by the Ruffians, were reftored to the Turks. Such were then the unimportant confequences of this war, which had coft Ruffia greatly above a hundred thousand men, and prodigious sums of money; fince the army was obliged to carry with Q 2 with it all the provisions and ammunition necelfary for the whole campaign: fo that at the commencement of an expedition, about a hundred thouland waggons were requilite for this conveyance, as a fupply must also be taken of water and wood, on account of the waterlefs fteppes through which they must march. Indeed the Krim was laid wafte in this war; but the Tartars were not quite exterminated; the Ruffians fuffered much from their attacks while in winter-quarters: and, even after the peace, they were still powerful enough to infest, the ruffian borders. On the other hand, the Turks no longer possessed the fortifications of Azof, but - neither did Ruffia retain them. Some few commercial advantages were all the gain that accrued from these fucceflive years of defolating and nurderous war.

One of the reafons why Ruffia was fo ready to follow the example of the houfe of Auftria, in concluding a peace, was undoubtedly becaufe fhe was afraid left Sweden, encouraged by the porte and France, which latter power was now of almost fovereign influence in the councils of Stockholm, might have recourfe to arms, and endeavour to make a diversion in the north of Ruffia, in favour of the porte, while it was engaged in the fouth by the ottoman troops. It is

is to be obferved, that Ruffia and Sweden had in 1724 entered into an alliance for the term of twelve years, by which they mutually guaranteed their dominions; and, in cafe of an attack, to affift each other with fhips and foldiers. At the expiration of these twelve years, this treaty was again renewed, [1736, when Ruffia even made herself responsible for the payment of a debt due from Sweden to Holland of 750,000 dutch guldens. But the amity of the two countries continued to stand on a very tottering basis. The generality of the Swedes could not bring themfelves abfolutely to forget the confiderable facrifices which they were reduced to make to Ruffia at the peace of Nyftadt; and the french court, which was friendly to the Ottomans, and confequently hoftile to Ruffia, exerted herfelf, by means of her ambaffador, to fan the difcontents against the latter, by reiterated efforts. Under the form of government that then obtained in Sweden, by which the national council in fact directed everything, while the king was but the fhadow of a monarch, the french cabinet found no difficulty in forming to itfelf a ftrong party, by prefents properly beftowed. Sweden now was in hopes that, while Ruffia was occupied with the Turks, fhe might venture fome enterprifes against that empire, with little danger of mifcarriage; and, notwithftanding that many true patriots remonftrated againft a war with Ruffia; notwithftanding that the peace fo recently concluded between Ruffia and the porte rendered it now more hazardous to attempt any thing againft that power, the warlike party at length triumphed in the diet; and war againft Ruffia became not only the wifh of that body, but alfo of the whole fwedifh nation and the majority of the eftates of the kingdom, when an event occurred by which every Swede thought himfelf infulted by the Ruffians.

A fwedifh major, named Sinclair *, who had been made prifoner at the battle of Pultava, then fent into Siberia, and, with the other prifoners his countrymen, was not fet at liberty till the peace of Nyftadt, had been fent by the fwedifh government to Conftantinople, to negotiate concerning the debts which Charles XII. had contracted there, but at the fame time to bring about a clofer connection between Sweden and the Porte. Sinclair, a determined foe to the Ruffians, on his way home through Poland had at times fpoken not very advantageoufly of the emprefs Anne, and had fuffered occafionally to efcape him fome intimations about an approaching humiliation of the ruffian pride by the combined power of the Swedes and Turks. Munich, who was then stationed at the polish frontiers, being informed of this, directed a particular attention to the fwedish officer, and laid a plan to entrap him on his journey back from Constantinople. In order to this, his picture was engraved, and numerous impreffions of it were difperfed among the ruffian officers commanding on the frontiers. Sinclair fet out from Constantinople in April 1739, travelled through Poland to Breflau, thence continued his journey; but, not far from Naumberg in Silefia, was attacked by feveral perfons, among whom were fome ruffian officers, and cruelly murdered. His fellow-traveller, Couturier, was then conveyed to the ruffian fort of Sonnenstein, but afterwards was fet at liberty, with a prefent of 500 ducats from the ruffian ambaffador, and arrived in September at Stockholm, where in the meantime Sinclair's difpatches had been received by the poft. This murder was generally reputed to have been perpetrated by an order from the ruffian court. The emperor of Germany complained heavily of the transaction as a violation of his territory; but Anne caufed a declaration to be drawn up, afferting her entire ignorance of the whole affair : and Mannstein, who . 94

who was adjutant-general to field-marshal count Munich, affirms likewife in his memoirs, that Anne actually knew nothing of it; adding, that this murder was folely the contrivance of her favourite Biren, count Oftermann, and marshal Munich, in order to come at the contents of the papers which Sinclair had about him. In the meantime the horrid transaction excited no fmall attention in Sweden; the french party took advantage of it for inflaming the refentment of the nation against the Russians; the populace of Stockholm, in tellimony of their indignation, broke the windows of the ruffian ambaffador's houfe; and the party in favour of war now found it more eafy to attain the accomplishment of their wifhes, a declaration of war against Ruffia. That government, quickly aware of the defigns of Sweden, had, however, in the meantime got her hands at liberty'by the peace concluded with the Turks, but wished neverthelefs to avoid engaging in a new war, as the wounds inflicted by that lately terminated were still fensibly felt, and accordingly entered into a negotiation with Sweden, in which, however, the year 1740 was entirely taken up. - Preparations were made notwithstanding on the part of Ruffia, by fecuring the frontiers of Finland, filling the magazines, providing the harbour of Cronfladt

Cronftadt with a competent garrifon, caufing the fortifications to be repaired, and getting everything in readiness for the commencement of hostilities. Ere the storm could burst from these threatening appearances, the empress Anne died at St. Petersburg [1740] after a reign of ten years.

Anne had not fat fo long on the ruffian throne without acquiring fome portion of fame, by executing and completing many things that had been begun by her uncle Peter I. - Though the turkish war, in which she engaged, proved of very little benefit to the empire on account of the peace rashly concluded by Austria; yet the ruffian troops had fhewn themfelves bold and intrepid in the course of it, and the Turks on the other hand had learnt to confider them as formidable adverfaries; for it was not the bravery of the Turks, but the frequent direful want of provisions, the strangeness of the climate, and the fatiguing marches, that prevented the ruffian army from making farther progrefs. Thus Anne fuccelsfully executed Peter's project of again convincing the porte of the fuperiority of the ruffian arms. - Then, the canal, along the Ladoga-lake, begun under Peter I. a work of extreme utility to the eafier transport of provifions to St. Peterfburg, was completely finished under under Anne in 1738, after the navigation on it had been opened in the reign of Peter II. Munich had the principal merit in the conftruction of this canal. - Peter, not long before his death, fent out feveral able perfons, to fail from Kamtshatka towards the north, in order to learn whether North America was connected with Siberia or not. But the enterprize terminated without gaining any clear information on the subject. Anne set on foot a new voyage in the fame defign, and thereby advanced the more accurate knowledge of those hitherto unexplored regions. - It had been one grand object with Peter I. from time to time to improve the ftate of the ruffian army: Anne here alfo followed his footsteps; and Munich was the man whose advice and propofals fhe adopted in the reform of the military. Marshal Munich introduced not only a better and stricter discipline, which was very much wanted among the Ruffians, wherein he was mightily affifted by the generals Lafcy and Keith, likewife foreigners, but alfo projected a completely new military exercife, and made in general a variety of uncommonly uleful regulations in the army. Thus, for example, he conftituted a corps of engineers, unknown till then among the Ruffians; and, as there was particularly a want of good officers, he moved moved the empress to establish an institution for the forming of able commanders. Anne, therefore, at his infligation, endowed the noble landcadet corps, for the education of young men of noble families in the feveral branches of knowledge neceffary for an officer, of which Munich drew up the plan. An inflitute that still fubfists, continuing to be improved and perfected from time to time, and ferving as a feminary of expert commanders. - As in the ruffian army the fingular cuftom prevailed, that men who held the fame rank, had yet a difference in their falaries, as they were either foreigners or natives; the former being far better paid than the latter, Munich procured an order that the pay of the officers, having the fame rank, whether foreigners or home-born, should be perfectly alike; on the whole, however, higher than had hitherto been the practice. By this alteration all caufe of envy on the part of the native Ruffians against foreigners was in a great measure done away. - For the fake of giving a fort of counterpoife to the two regiments of guards, which had already shewn that their influence, even in determining the fucceffion to the imperial diadem, was by no means fmall, Anne added to them a regiment of foot-guards, and another of horfe; to the army was also given a few regiments of cuiraffiers, cuirafficis, which it had never had before. — Munich had the fatisfaction to fee his imperial miftrefs teflify her concurrence with his plan by putting it in execution, and the honour of finding that it even met the approbation of that great commander prince Eugene of Savoy.

Befide the changes by which Anne endeavoured to put the army in a better condition, fhe was particularly attentive to the benefits that might accrue to her empire from new or renovated treaties of commerce. In a view to the extension of trade, and thereby to better the condition of a great proportion of her fubjects, fhe was induced to relinquish the perfian provinces. Her ambaffadors at foreign courts had her commission to look out for industrious and able perfons in those kinds of trades and profeffions in which Ruffia was still behind, and fent them into the empire : fhe particularly procured for the country a great number of manufacturers in woollen ftuffs and filk. She executed a new treaty of commerce with Great Britain, and was in general no inactive ruler, taking upon herfelf the affairs of administration, and governing with gentlenefs and equanimity, except in those cafes when fhe thought it behoved her to punish, and then fhe was fevere. Her long refidence in Mittau, her intercourfe with the courish nobles.

bles, in general remarkable for their urbanity and franknefs, had communicated to her character a certain fweetnefs and affability, which eafily gained her the affection of all that approached her. The manners of the peterfburg court, during her reign, took a fofter and politer turn. Drunken perfons, formerly frequent among the courtiers, made their difgufting appearance at court much feldomer, under her, as fhe detefted drunkennefs. Delighting in the more decent and tranquil pleafures of mufic and dancing, the encouraged them by not only taking foreign fingers and performers into her fervice, but also provided that young Ruffians of both fexes should be instructed in those 2715.

The number of the fubjects received a great increafe under Anne, by the return of the zaporogian Kozaks to their obedience to the ruffian fceptre, which happened fhortly after the breaking out of the turkifh war. Thefe Kozaks in the time of Peter I. adhered to Mazeppa; and, on the latter being forced to flee with Charles XII. had put themfelves under the fupremacy of the khan of the Krimea The territory of the empire was alfo enlarged, on the fubmiffion of the Kirghifes, a very numerous nomadizing nation on the chinefe borders, to the protection of of the ruffian government, whence thefe advantages arole to the empire, that the neighbouring ruffian tribes were put in fafety from thole attacks to which they were continually expoled; and that the commerce between Ruffia and China, which had hitherto been not unfrequently diffurbed by thefe hoftilities, could now be carried on more freely and unimpeded, and even between the Kirghifes and the Ruffians a new trade might be opened.

Her reign would have been ftill more happy for Ruflia, her memory far more honoured, if her favourite John Erneft von Biren had not fo flagrantly abufed the confidence fhe repofed in him, by rendering a multitude of perfons and families completely wretched *, and had not the teftament left by her unhappily been the occafion of a feries of revolutions in the throne, following one upon the other, every one of which was infallibly attended, mediately and immediately, with the misfortune and ruin of many thoufand people.

John Ernest Biren was the fon of a gamekeeper in Courland, studied at Kænigsberg, came back to Mittau; and, on being prefented to the duchefs Anne, pleased her fo well that she appointed him her fecretary. This was the first step to that height of fortune to which this man gradually rofe. Anne fhortly after made him her chamberlain; and it was now generally understood that he was the duchefs's favourite. This gave occasion to the chief men of Ruffia, who drew up the capitulation to be agreed to by Anne, to infert the condition, dreading his influence, that on her election Biren should not come with her to Mofco. Anne came indeed without him; but he prefently followed, was made by his patroness first lord of the bedchamber, and created a ruffian count, and was inftated in the fame place with the emprefs which he had filled with the duchefs, continued to be Anne's all-powerful minion, though he did not attempt to turn out Oftermann and Munich, as he found them both ufeful men. Ferdinand, duke of Courland, dying in 1737 without leaving a male heir; and, by that event, the Kettler family becoming extinct, Biren artfully took fuch measures as to induce the courish nobles, who had already conferred on him the patent of nobility in 1730, to elect him their duke, and to fettle that dignity on him and his heirs male in perpetuity. A choice in which neither the conviction of public merit in the the perfon elected, or free will in the electors, had certainly any fhare; but was as much influenced by the ruffian troops, then flationed in Courland, as the prefence of the fame troops, in more recent times, operated on the election of Staniflaus king of Poland *. The courifh nobility, accordingly, had very foon caufe to lament that their choice had been obliged to fall upon Biren †, as the new duke commonly refided in St. Peterfourg, concerning himfelf not at all about his country, but even there dooming to punifhment every one who by any means had drawn upon him his displeasure, as despotically as the constitution of Russia allowed *.

† He was elected on the death of Ferdinand, laft prince of the houfe of Kettler. The Courlanders were forced to accept for their fovereign him whom they knew to be grandfen of a groom to their duke James III. and whom they had refufed to affociate with their nobility. The emprefs had already made Biren many a courifh lady of the family of Treden. A brother of Biren's wife had the info-Linee one day to attempt fome familiarities with the prince's Elizabeth, whom he met walking alone in the gardens of Peterhof. Elizabeth complained of it to the emprefs Anne, who only laughed at the brutality of Treden, and told Elizabeth that the might furely allow a courifh nobleman to take what the every day granted freely to a grenadier of the guards. This grenadier, it is well known, was Alexius Razumoffky.

In the government of the ruffian empire, under Anne, Biren had an abfolute influence; and it is very poffible to conceive that the turkifh war, which Offermann and Munich were at first decidedly against, was profecuted by that monarch chiefly at the instigation of Biren, as by that means he had it in his power to keep marshal Munich at a distance from Petersburg. Munich had been fo fortunate as to gain the confidence and effeem of his fovereign in an eminent degree; and Biren was afraid of him as a dangerous rival, in knowledge and experience undoubtedly his superior.

Anne, though a widow, was still young when the came to the imperial throne; and, as it was probable that she might marry again, the council had very wifely inferted a clause in the capi-

It was no uncommon thing, even at the publie feftivities, to fee the minifters of Vienna, Berlin, and Saxony, kifling the hand of the favourite, and drinking his health on their knees, after having given this toaff: "Per-" dition to whoever refufes to do the like, and is not the "true, fincere, and faithful friend of his highnefs' mon-" feigneur the duke de Birep !"

tulation, that fhe fhould not take a confort without the confent of that body. By nullifying the capitulation, Anne indeed became entirely free in this refpect; but Biren, who generally took great care to remove whatever might in the least degree have a tendency to limit his influence, cut off therefore every opportunity to a fecond marriage of his mistrefs. A prince of Portugal, who came to St. Peterfburg for the purpofe of, folliciting her hand, was obliged to go back. without his errand. For fimilar reafons Biren exerted all his talents to oppose the marriage of the princels Anne, daughter of the duke of Mecklenburg, and of Catharine Ivanovna, elder fister to the empress Anne. Her majesty, who had no intention to enter again into the flate of wedlock, was defirous at least that her niece should take a husband *. Her defign was to confider the children proceeding from fuch marriage in all refpects as her own; and, by fettling apon them the fuccession, to prevent the * Several princes had made offers to marry this princefs, who was afterwards fo unfortunate. The king of Pruffia, Frederic William I. was ambitious of having her for his fon Frederic, in order to fee him heir of the crown of Ruffia, and at liberty to leave that of Pruffia to prince William Henry. If that project had fucceeded what immenfe advantages would not Frederic II. have drawn from the great means thus put at his difpofal!

diforders and tumults, which were naturally to be apprehended, if the thould leave the world without having nominated an heir. Count Lœvenvolde, master of the horfe, was accordingly fent to the court of Vienna to make choice of a spoule for the princes Anne. Charles, margrave of Brandenburg, and prince Anthony Ulric of Brunfwick, were the two princes whom Lævenvolde, on his return, declared worthy of foliciting a marriage with Anne; and Anthony Ulric, duke of Brunfwick, was at length the perfon pitched on for her spouse: The duke therefore came to Ruffia. Biren faw this with diflike, fearing, as he must, that the father of the future fucceffor might ftand in the way of his authority, and therefore endeavoured by every effort to break off, if poffible, the projefted match. Perhaps, as he has been accufed, and indeed not without grounds, he might have had a plan of bringing about a union between his fon and the princefs. - However, in spite of all his exertions, the marriage was confummated in the month of July 1739; and, on the 12th of August 1740, the princess, to the great joy of the empress Anne, became the mother of a prince, whom the fovereign immediately took under her tuition, and in the October following declared him her fucceffor to the throne.

The

The emprefs about this time felt that probably. fhe had not long to live. - This apprehenfion moved her to caufe the oath of fealty to the newborn Ivan as fucceffor to be taken by all her fubjects. At the fame time the profpect of the fpeedy diffolution of the empress fet the heads of the administration, Biren, Munich, and Oftermann, in motion. Ivan, the fucceffor, was only a few weeks old; and must, therefore, if Anne should prefently dic, have a guardian. The choice of this guardian was that in which Anne on her death-bed and the great men at court were not a little employed. Though his parents feemed to be the natural guardians of his infancy, and had the foremost claim to that charge, yet Biren, Munich, and Oftermann had formed very different plans, and never refted till they had got a paper figned by Anne, appointing duke Biren guardian of the young emperor Ivan, and regent of the empire during his minority *. . . It

* The artful Offermann, who, in concert with the favourite, had fabricated the will of Anne, in which, excluding the dushefs of Brunfwick from the fucceffion, facleft the throne to Ivan and the regency to Biren, now framed a petition in the name of the feveral orders of the flate, requefting Biren to accept the place of regent, which his ambition had already anticipated; and, what one would fearcely believe, notwithflanding all we have read, the principal members of the clerical order, the prime nobles, the minifters, and the fenators were bafe enough to fign this requeft. Was was certainly Biren's with that the bufinefs fhould take this turn, though he directly after pretended to deny it, giving out that he had only yielded to Munich's importunity. However, it is poffible that he might not at first have ventured to propose himself as guardian; fearing too violent an opposition ; and afterwards, by an affected reluctance, as 'if it' were difficult for him to refolve, he caufed himfelf to be much importuned ere he would comply with the request of Ostermann and Munich to take the regency upon him. But thefe two politic ministers had concurred in bringing this matter about, in hopes that Biren would fhew his gratitude to them, by undertaking, as regent, nothing of importance without them, but confult them on all occafions, fo that they alfo would have been'a part of the regency; in which Oftermann would have directed the affairs of flate, while Munich was at the head of the military department : whereas if duke Anthony Ulric fhould have the regency and the guardianship, they were afraid that he might look upon it as a thing due to him of right, and therefore not think himfelf under any fort of obligation to them, though they fhould procure it for him, and accordingly not leave them fo much fcope for acting as they pleafed. The project of conveying veying the administration of the empire into the hands of duke Biren of course succeeded, particularly fince the parents of the emperor happily. observed a perfect filence in the busines; and, when the last will of Anne was opened in the presence of the minister, the senators, the chiefs of the army, as well as of duke Anthony Ulric and his lady, it was found to contain the following injunction, already known to feveral, to others totally unexpected : " Biren shall be the " administrator of government till the emperor " Ivan fhall have attained his feventeenth year, " at which period he shall be declared of age. " Should Ivan die before that time, then Biren " fhall continue guardian to Ivan's brethren " born after him who shall fucceed him on the " throne. Should neither Ivan nor any one of " his brethren afterwards born remain alive, " then shall Biren, with the concurrence of " the cabinet, the fenate, and the generals of " the army, elect and confirm a new emperor, " who shall conduct all the affairs of the em-" pire, foreign and domestic, as unlimited and " abfolute monarch of Ruffia,"

Though nobody dared openly to oppugn this dying injunction of the empress Anne, by which a foreigner was placed, for many years to come, at the head of the government; as whoever had prefumed prefumed to do fo would have infallibly brought upon-himfelf either death or perpetual exile, yet the public was by no means fatisfied with this testament. The-parents of the emperor must have felt themfelves most hurt at feeing a man who had made his fortune chiefly by perfonal gratifications with the deceased empress, entrufted with a guardianship which they naturally had reason to expect, and to which no perfon had a nearer claim than they. Anne thanked duke Biren for confenting to take upon him the weighty cares of government; but probably thefe thanks did not proceed from the heart, only ferving as a delicate concealment of her mortification at the testamentary injunction of her aunt.

Biren was now mounted on the higheft pinnacle of grandeur to which his imagination could have ever prompted him to afpire: if he was not addreffed in the ftyle of emperor, he had however the profpect of being for feveral years the ruler of the ruffian empire. He took his refidence in the imperial fummer-palace, giving the parents of the emperor, who would by no means be perfuaded to quit their fon, the winter-palace for their dwelling, with a yearly penfion of 200,000. Inftead of being called, as before, R 4 illuftrious illustrious prince, he assumed the title "of his highness, tegent of the russian empire;" at the fame time, however, granting to duke Ulric the title of "his highness."

The difcontents excited at the new regency very foon and plainly appeared. There were not wanting perfons who thought it an act of injustice to the parents of the emperor, to whom both the guardianship of Ivan, and the regency of the empire, ought properly to have been commited; while others were irritated at feeing Biren at the head of the government. The regent had his fpies, who informed him immediately of all that was faid ;) and he thought he provided in the best way for his fafery, by feverely punishing fuch as expressed their difpleafure: fo that a great, number of perfons were plunged into irretrievable diffress for having imprudently delivered their fentiments on Biren's elevation; and the natural confequence of it was, that the difcontents, inftead of being fuppreffed, fpread more and more, and duke Ulric now perceived that it would be no difficult matter to feize the regency out of Biren's hands.

He plainly told the regent that he would proteft against the will of the late empress, as invalid, and that he even should not be difpleafed pleafed if it brought about an alteration in the regency. Expostulations and quarrels fucceeded between him and the regent, which at length grew to fuch a height, that the duke threw up all his employments. While this difunion lasted between duke Ulric and the regent, count Munich was always the middle perfon, through whom the regent caufed the duke and his fpoufe to be told many difagreeable things. . Munich employed this opportunity for gaining the - confidence of these two neglected personages, hearkened to, their complaints against duke Biren, affented to the reafonablenefs of many of them, and in this manner the franknefs and intimacy between them grew greater from day to day. At length the duke and his fpoufe let fall, in the prefence of Munich, fome words, intimating that they had a defign to force the guardianship from the regent, and the marshal in the fame undifguifed manner gave them to understand that they might rely on his affiftance in the execution of their plan. Munich, whole ambition and vanity knew no bounds, recreated his mind with the profpect of lording at court, under the aufpices of duke Ulric and Anne, if they by his afliftance fhould attain their end; and he might also hope that his project to depose Biren would be attended with fucces, particuparticularly as the regent was far from being beloved, while Munich was much honoured, efpecially by the army; and thus he who, but a few weeks before, had contributed fo much to Biren's appointment as regent, was now the most active promoter of his difgrace, the most zealous adherent to Biren's antagonists, the princefs and her spoule. The enterprise admitted of no delay; and therefore they waited no longer than to the nineteenth of November for putting their plot in execution, by which the young emperor's parents were to take upon themfelves the government of the empire, as guardians of the monarch. The regent Biren, his confort, his family, and his firmest partifans, being without trouble taken into cuftody in the night, all the great men then in town affembled before day-break at the palace, and the princefs Anne received homage on the fame day as grandduchefs of Ruffia, and guardian of her fon, the infant emperor *.

Only

* Biren lodged in the fummer-palace. During fupper he feemed thoughtful; and all at once faid to Munich, " M. le marechal, have you never gone upon any important " enterprife in the night-time ?" The marfhal immediately thought his feheme was different ?" The marfhal immediately thought his feheme was different ?" I cannot call to mind " any extraordinary matters that I have undertaken during " the

Only two and twenty days had Biren poffeffed his flupendous fortune; and from the many cares and difquietudes that attended it, even that fhort fpace was without enjoyment. From the caftle of Schluffelburg, where he was confined as a prifoner, he was brought to a trial, condemned, and exiled in June to Pelim in Siberia *, where,

" the night; but I make it a rule to feize all opportunities " that feem favourable to my views." After fitting fome time longer, he took his leave, and went firait to the winterpalace, which was occupied by the young emperor and his parents; and, after having engaged the duchefs of Brunfwick to admit of her party the officers and the hundred and forty foldiers on guard about the tzar, he returned to the regent, whom he arrefted by a detachment of twenty men, commanded by the aid-de-camp Mannftein.

YTL CLIPPE

* The charges that were brought againft him, and recited as the reafon and juftification of the fentence of banifhment paffed upon him, in the imperial manifefto that was publifhed in that behalf, were the following: That the duke, during the laft illnefs of the emprefs Anne, had thought of nothing but how to obtain the regency, to the exclusion of the emperor's parents; that he had fquandered away extraordinary fums from the imperial treafury, and moftly employed it to his own emolument out of the empire; that he and his family had fcornfully neglected to fhew a proper refpect to the parents of the emperor; and, in order to deprive them of the public affection, had fpread various forts of calumnies againft them; that he had challenged 252

where, in addition to his misfortune, he was obliged, in banifhment and mifery, to affociate with the numerous wretches who owed their banifhment and mifery to him *.

Thus, Anne having obtained her aim, by procuring the guardianfhip of her fon and the regency of the empire, the ambitious Munich, who expected now to be all in all under the new administration, gave no respite to his efforts till the prefent regent had conferred on him the title of minister, the post enjoyed by Ostermann, who still remained at the head of affairs. But lenged the father of the emperor to fight a duel with him (1), and obliged him to give up his places; that he acted of his own mere motion, contrary to flatness and ordinances, and conceived fuch plans as would have thrown the empire into the greateft confusion. "He hath, therefore," concludes the manifesto, "by the laws of God, of nature, and "of the empire, merited death." The emperor, however, freed him from capital punihment, but condemned him with his family to perpetual impriforment.

* Biren was fo dreaded, that when he rode on horfeback through the fireets, people, on feeing him come at a diflance, exclaimed, " It is Biren, let us run !" Perfons on foot made as faft as they could for the first gateway. Those who were in carriages stopped, got out and profirated themselves before him.

(1) At a particular altercation, matters indeed did go fo far, that Biren, in the heat of his pathon, put his hand to his fivord.

what Munich in reality frove to obtain was the ftation of commander in chief of the army and navy; howeversin this attempt it was impoffible for him to fucceed, as those places were already posseffed by duke Ulric : he therefore contented himfelf with extorting the former title from the regent. At this, however, count Oftermann did not fail to take umbrage, and accordingly attached himfelf more clofely to the duket who allo was fenfible to the affront put upon him by Munich's application for his posts *. Thus arole two parties'; one-headed by Anne and Munich, and the other by Oftermann and the duke. Oftermann, undoubtedly one of the most able and acute politicians of his time, foon found opportunities of displaying his extensive views in politics, as well as his comprehenfive knowledge of the ruffian empire, in fo ftriking a manner, that even Anne placed more confidence in him than fhe did in count Munich.

* How could he help being offended at the following ukafe, in which the duke is appointed generaliffimo, and which was drawn up by Munich? It runs thus: "Though "field-marfhal Munich, on account of the great fervices he "has rendered the empire, might claim the poft of gene-"raliffimo, yet he has waved that right in favour of duke "Anthony Ulric, as the father of his imperial majefty, and "has been contented to accept the place of prime minifer."

The

The king of Pruffia, Frederic II. had juft then begun his reign; who, not pleafed at feeing the amity that fubfifted between the courts of Peterfburg and Vienna, endeavoured to make Munich his friend; and Frederic found it not very difficult, by flattering letters, fo to work upon his vanity, that this minifter, already not well difpofed to Auftria, now made it his principal bufinefs to bring about a more intimate connection between the ruffian court and that of Berlin. By this means the clofe union that had hitherto fubfifted between Auftria and Ruffia was diffolved, and the whole political fyftem of Europe totally changed.

A defensive treaty had before been concluded between the ruffian and pruffian courts. Munich effected the renewal of it; and both parties mutually bound themfelves to furnish an aid of 12,000 men, in cafe of an attack. Anne, however, fecretly determined to adhere to the terms of this treaty only fo long as Pruffia fhould be at peace with Auftria, the remonstrances of Oftermann having infpired her with a partiality for that houfe : and Frederic having now adopted measures for taking possession of Silesia, as a part of the inheritance of Maria Therefa, the court of St. Petersburg intimated to him that it never would confent to that act. Accordingly, 4.10 at at the commencement of the year 1741 a new alliance was formed with the imperial court, with an engagement to furnish auxiliaries. Munich, extremely diffatisfied at this procedure, ftrove to retard its execution, but in vain : he requefted his difmiffion; hoping by that means to induce Anne to lend a more favourable ear to his representations; but this too had no effect: an honourable difmission was granted him, under pretence that, from the state of his health and his age, he could no longer be useful to the fervice. Munich, it is true, remained at St. Peterfburg, in the hope of being employed again; but he was mistaken - the protracting his ftay there foon after brought upon him an involuntary journey to Siberia.

One of the most remarkable events that happened during the regency of the duchefs of Brunfwick was the arrival at Mosco of an embassy from Thamas Kouli khan. After having usurped the throne of the sophis, and conquered the empire of the Mongoles, Thamas Kouli khan, who had heard much concerning the beauty of the princess Elizabeth, fent to ask her in marriage, at the same time promising to introduce the greek religion into Persia. His ambassador was attended by fixteen thousand men and twenty pieces of cannon. But this formidable troop was was invited to ftop at Kitzliar on the borders of the Terek, and the ambaffador made his entry into Mofco with a train of only three thoufand perfons on horfeback. He prefented to the regent, on the part of the fhah, fourteen elephants and a great quantity of jewels, among which were very large diamonds *. The prefents were accepted, and the propofals of marriage rejected.

Ruffia, however, took no active part in the war between Pruffia and Auftria, as the king of Poland and the elector of Saxony, who themfelves raifed pretentions to Therefa's patrimony, protefted against the march of the ruffian troops through Poland; and Sweden at the fame time threatened to open the campaign against the Ruffians on the frontiers of Finland, in confequence of a formal declaration of war against Ruffia, at Stockholm, in the month of August.

* Thefe diamonds came from the Mongolèy. Thamas Kouli khan brought away from that empire to the value of 146 millions of pounds fterling in precious flones, in gold, filver, and other valuables. The throne of the peacock alone, which he conveyed away from Dehli, was effimated at 202,500,000 francs, or nine kiurures. The kiurure makes a hundred laks, each lak a hundred thoufand rupees. The rupee varies in value, but may be generally effimated at 2 s. 3 d. fterling.

It

It was well known in Sweden, that the ruffian nation in general was by no means fatisfied with the prefent government, and that, therefore, fome alteration in it was fhortly to be expected. The court of France too was at no fmall pains. by its ambaffador at Petersburg, to effect a revolution there, from which Sweden hoped to derive advantage. The latter reckoned fo certainly that fhe flould come off conqueror in the approaching war, and the Ruffians be vanguished, that in the diet of Stockholm, previous to the opening of the campaign, no lefs than three fets of articles were framed, on which the would hereafter make peace with the conquered Ruffians. Should the arms of Sweden be completely fuccefsful, then Ruffia fhould give back Karelia, Ingria, Elthonia, and Livonia, and, in fhort, all that had been ceded to her at the peace of Nystadt; were she no more than partially fuccefsful, it was expected that at least Karelia, Kexholm, Vyborg, Peterfburg, Nœteburg, Kronstadt, Kronschlot, the whole extent of the river Neva and Efthonia should be restored. In cafe, however, contrary to all probability, Ruffia might not be fo far humbled as to furtender all these territories, then she should be allowed to retain Esthonia; but the rest of the countries just mentioned must be in any cafe evacuated VOL. H. s evacuated by her, without permiffion to keep a fingle flip on the livonian and efthonian coafts, and with an obligation from her to grant the free exportation of corn. It has rarely happened that any national council ever extended its plans of aggrandifement fo far, with fo great a deficiency in the neceffary means for carrying them into execution, as Sweden did on this occafion. She deliberately fettled the conditions of the future peace, though utterly unconcerned about a proper arrangement for the conduct of the war by which thefe terms of , accommodation were to be fecured. It is even faid by a fwedifh hiftorian, that " No man " knew of any generals, who by fkill and expe-" rience had gained the public efteem." The two generals Levenhaupt and Buddembrock, who were the greatest advocates for the war, when hoftilities were begun conducted them but miferably. The fleet was not in a condition to put to fea. The army, though brave and zealous, was poorly fupplied with provisions; and, for want of good plans for the campaign, and intelligent officers, could effect very little.

Ruffia, refolving not to be behind hand with the Swedes, fent Lafcy to march against them in August 1741, before they had time properly to collect their forces, and defeated them near near Vilmannstrand. The furrender of that fortress to Russia was the confequence of this victory; and though the Swedes now rallied in fuch manner that the Ruffians, who were greatly inferior in numbers, could proceed no farther, yet they did nothing more through the whole of that campaign. As the Swedes, in entering upon this war, had principally laid their account in the fuppofition that things could not remain tranquil in Ruffia, they dispersed a manifesto, in the view of inciting the Russians to attempt a revolution; hoping at the fame time that it would not pafs over fo quietly as the former had done, that the troops then wanted in the interior must be drawn away from the borders, and the Swedes would thus have free fcope to act with effect against Ruffia. " The fole intention " on the part of Sweden," fays the manifesto, " is to defend herfelf by arms against the op-" preffions exercifed against her by the arrogant " foreigners *, the ministers of the ruffian court, " and at the fame time to deliver the ruffian " nation from the yoke which these ministers " have imposed on it, by affifting the Ruffians se to regain their right of electing for themfelves " a lavoful ruler."

* By these foreigners were meant Munich and Oftermann.

It was, therefore, not from a want of good will in the fwedifh government, that no rebellion arofe againft its prefent rulers, and that a civil war, with all its horrors, did not enfue; for it thus expressly declared the regency unlawful. Happy, however, it was for Ruffia, that the revolution which happened this very year, in November 1741, and was not brought about by the fwedish manifesto, but by very different motives, was effected without bloodshed, that the alteration of the perfon of the ruler produced no farther changes, excepting among the heads of the administration, and that it was attended with no confusion or diffurbance in the empire.

What facilitated, however, in an eminent degree, the revolution by which Elizabeth became empress of Russia, was the behaviour both of Anne and her confort the duke. There was no harmony nor confidence between them. The regent fhut herfelf up entirely with a countefs Mengden, with whom fhe lived on the most intimate footing, entirely eftranged from her hufband, paffing whole days and weeks in a total neglect of government affairs; and thus, no lefs than by the influence which fhe allowed that lady to exert, created to herfelf many enemies. The envy and jealoufy of the native Ruffians were every day increased by the partiality univerfally verfally fhewn to the german party : hence it proceeded, that no more concord fubfifted between the ministers Ostermann and Munich. than between the duke and the regent; one party being conftantly employed in thwarting and counteracting the other. Thus, though Anne abhorred feverity, and her government was extremely mild; though fhe was ever prompt to beftow favours and exercife her liberality : yet thus in fhort it was, that the enterprife of Leftocq, the phyfician to the princefs Elizabeth, for feating her on the throne of her father, was attended with fuccefs.

For abating the influence of foreigners in the administration of the empire, the plan of a con-, vention had been framed on the demife of Peter II. by which the fupreme authority was to be placed in the council, whereof the greater part were Ruffians. This was annulled by Anne; and Biren a foreigner was all-powerful under that princefs : Oftermann being the foul of the administration, and Munich the first man in the army; the foreigners therefore remained at the head of affairs.

Anne died ; but the foreigners still continued in the chief offices of ftate : Biren being little lefs than emperor and autocrator of all the Ruffias; and, after his downfall, which followed on the

the heels of his fuccefs, the government remained, neverthelefs, in the hands of Oflermann and Munich. The emperor Ivan himfelf was but a very remote descendant of the tzarian houfe of Romanof; his father was a german prince, his mother the daughter of a german prince, only his great-grandfather on the mother's fide, Ivan, brother to Peter I. was defcended from the Romanofs : in appearance, therefore, it was rather a foreign than a ruffian family that was now in possession of the throne; and the more, as the various offices of the flate were given with increasing partiality to foreigners, This was taken very much amifs by the country at large, and the defire of an alteration on their part greatly facilitated that which prefently after happened. As the plot for the overthrow of Biren had fucceeded without refistance, it was eafy to forefee that it might prove no lefs feafible to displace Anne; who, from her inconfistent behaviour, by her contempt of the ruffian cuftoms, by the exorbitant favours fhe lavished on her adherents, mostly foreigners, had but little hold on the hearts of the people, and efpecially as a candidate for the crown had flarted up, who must naturally be more agreeable to the nation, being a true-born Ruffian, than the present emperor.

The perfon thus afpiring to the crown was no other than the prince's Elizabeth, daughter of Peter the Great, refiding at St. Peter/burg, in the very bofom of the court. On the death of Peter II. fhe might, perhaps, have preferred her pretenfions to the throne of her father not without fucce's; but at that time fhe made not the fmalleft flir in this defign. She even remained quiet during all the reign of Anne, though the Dolgorukies were accufed of an intention of advancing her to the imperial feat *, continuing to live with that emprefs on the moft amicable term's, exciting no furmifes of that nature, either * Towards the end of the year 1739, the Dolgorukies were arrefled and put to the torture. They confessed that they had concerted an infurrection for carrying off the emprefs, the princefs Anne and her confort, together with the duke of Courland, to drive all the Germans out of the country, to proclaim Elizabeth empress, and to marry her to one of the Narishkins. How much truth was at the bottom of this confession, how much of it was to be imputed to the torture, by means of which, whatever is wanted may be extorted, cannot now be afcertained. Biren hated the Dolgorukies, as the principal authors of the capitulation, and the claufe that he should not be permitted to come to Ruffia. Add to this, that, as one of the first families of the empire, they were always dangerous; accordingly, one of them was broke alive upon the wheel, three others were decapitated, and two thrown into a dungeon for life. This may ferve as an inftance of Biren's ufual manner of acting.

in her or her partizans, and as, from her whole behaviour fhe feemed more difposed to enjoy the pleasures of life in full measure, than to take upon her the weighty burden of fuch a government as that of Russia. Befides, Elizabeth had very few intimacies among the great men at court; and there was not the flighteft appearance of any party at all devoted to her: fhe attached herfelf more to the foldiery, particularly to the guards; and there feldom paffed a week, in which fhe did not once or twice ftand fponfor at the christening of the children of fome of those foldiers. If, therefore, it might occasionally occur to the emprefs Anne that it would be preferable to place Elizabeth in fuch a fituation as would render it impossible for her to form any defign upon her father's throne, perhaps by fending her into a convent; every anxiety was foon difpelled by the manner of life and the whole deportment of Elizabeth : indeed Biren himfelf was always against the idea of attempting anything to the prejudice of that princefs. It is alfo probable that, under the emprefs Anne, Elizabeth laid no plan for afcending the throne, and that the project first entered her mind, on the demife of that monarch, at feeing an infant emperor, under the tutelage of a foreigner, accede to the fceptre; and, fhortly after, the 'parents parents of the emperor, who likewife were to be regarded rather as foreigners than as Ruffians, get poffeffion of the guardianship, and hearing it even reported that the princess Anne, Ivan's mother, had resolved, at the instigation of count Ostermann, to declare herfelf empress on her birthday in the ensuing December [1741], and to fettle the fuccession in the line of her daughters.

Now it was that the advice of Leftocq, Elizabeth's phyfician and favourite, found ready admiffion; and he exerted all his zeal and addrefs in collecting a body of partizans, by whofe affiftance he might put the reins of empire into the hands of his patronefs. Bringing together by degrees a number of the foldiers of the guards who were devoted to Elizabeth, they promifed to fupport her in the attempt to feat herfelf on the throne of her father, and likewife to perfuade their comrades to engage in the fame caufe*. The money neceffary for the enter-

* A broken merchant, now corporal in the preobrajenski guards, named Grunstein, and one Schwartz, a trumpeter, were the first whom Lestocq prevailed upon to listen to his proposal. The hopes of making their fortune induced these people to enter into the scheme themselves, and to gain accomplices. After the enterprise had fucceeded they were both amply rewarded,

prife was furnished partly by Elizabeth and partly obtained by Leftocq from M. de la Chetardie, the french ambaffador at St. Peterfburg, who offered his affiftance in bringing about this revolution, in hopes that the new emprefs would, from gratitude to France, no longer take part with Auftria; and as Sweden might, perhaps, likewife on this occafion be fomewhat a gainer. In the meantime Elizabeth's courage drooped as the execution of her plot drew nigh, and fhe put it off from day to day. The foldiers moreover, who had been induced to take up the bufinels, were not people to be trufted with a fecret of that magnitude; and there was already fomething of a rumour abroad concerning fome project of the princefs. It even reached the cars of the regent; and fhe would not have been to blame if the had employed the means the had in her power of confining Elizabeth. But Anne, notwithstanding all she had heard of the business, was unaccountably carelefs, taking no more fteps about it than if nothing was passing to alarm her fecurity : a conduct, for which, afterwards when it was too late to rectify her mistake, she was feverely reproached by her hufband. But, inftead of confulting him on the best measures to be adopted on such a ferious occafion, the concealed everything from him. Count

:66

Count Oftermann warned her of her danger; the british minister prophesied her certain ruin, unlefs fhe took the proper means to prevent it; fhe received an anonymous letter, in which fhe fhe was conjured to beware of an approaching fhock; and indeed it was difficult to conceive how the could entertain the least doubts on the matter : yet, instead of reforting to any methods of counteraction, fuch as by the feizure of Leftocq, to deprive the prime mover and most zealous promoter of the plot from all power of mifchief, as the duke propofed, the difclofed to Elizabeth, in full court *, the whole contents of the admonitory letter fhe had received, and the reports that were fpread. Certainly this was not the way to come at the truth. Elizabeth confessed nothing, protested that she was entirely innocent; and, by diffimulation and even tears, effectually difpelled all ideas of fufpicion in Anne. Leftocq had previoufly appointed the day of the confectation of the waters † for Elizabeth to make her appearance publicly as claimant of the throne, to put herfelf at the head of her followers, to affert her right to the fucceffion by a public declaration, and to caufe herfelf to be proclaimed emprefs.

* On the 4th of December.

+ The 6th of January 1742.

But

But no fooner did he learn from Elizabeth the fubject of this conversation, than he would hear of no farther delays, redoubled his activity, got daily more partizans for Elizabeth, by means of french gold, and inculcated it more forcibly than ever upon her that there was now no time for hefitation unlefs the would give up all for loft. He told her that the guards were foon to march towards Sweden, and that fhe would thus lofe those on whose affistance the reckoned most; adding, that this alone was reafon fufficient for accelerating the cataftrophe. Elizabeth, appearing to be still irrefolute, Lestocq the next morning pulled out of his pocket-book a card, on one fide whereof he had drawn Elizabeth in a nun's habit, furrounded by a number of gibbets; on the other, that princefs with the crown on her head attended by a circle of nobles : a contrivance by which he meant tacitly to fuggeft to her the choice of one or the other of these fituations for herfelf and her friends; that all depended on a moment, and if that moment were fuffered to escape no choice would remain, but the former would inevitably be their portion. Upon this, Elizabeth feemed refolved to put all to the hazard for obtaining the crown; and, as the revolution occafioned by the apprehending of Biren by night had been quietly effected without without bloodshed, the nocturnal filence it was thought would be favourable to the prefent attempt; and the following night, between the fifth and fixth of December, was fixed upon for the execution of this important project, in which Leftocq undertook the principal part, in the expectation, if all fucceeded, of honours and rewards, but in cafe of a miscarriage, of certain death. He now prepared his accomplices and adherents, went in the evening and fetched fome thousand ducats from the french ambassador, in order to obviate or to conquer all oppofition and refiftance by that powerful application, money; then repaired to the apartments of the princefs Elizabeth, and intreated her to follow him to take possession of her father's throne. Even now Elizabeth betrayed her want of fortitude; Leftocq, however, at length got the better of her fears. She threw herfelf proftrate before a crucifix, repeated a long prayer, got up perfectly composed, after having made a folemn vow that no blood fhould be fhed in this attempt, put on the riband of the order of St. Catharine, and placed herfelf in a fledge with a chamberlain by her fide, behind which two grenadiers stepped up as guards. Leftocq and Schwartz followed in a fecond fledge. They drove directly to the barracks of the preobrajenski guards. At fome diffance

diftance from the gate-way the fledges flopped fhort, and Elizabeth proceeded on foot, attended by her fledge-party, that they might excite the lefs attention. Holding the crofs in her hand - by which fuch great things had already fo often been performed - fhe made a fpeech to the foldiers, in justification of her enterprize, to place herfelf on the throne. She had certainly much to advance in her behalf; and it must naturally have made great impression on the native Ruffians, when the mentioned, that, as the daughter of the immortal emperor Peter the Great, fhe had refolved to wield the fceptre of her father; that though fhe had been unjustly forced aside from the throne by a foreign child, and though there was even a defign on foot to bury her in a convent, yet the faithful guards were they by whofe affiftance and fupport fhe now cherished the hope of afcending the paternal throne. - A part of the guards were already made acquainted with the bufinefs, and had been gained over to espouse it by money, fair speeches, promises and rewards on one fide, and on the other by denunciations of cruel punifhments in cafe of oppofition; the force of furprife, which was increafed by the diftribution of inflammatory liquors and Elizabeth's affable and captivating demeanor, foon brought over moft of of the remainder. A few of them, however, abfolutely would not be either bribed or perfuaded to hearken to Elizabeth's pretention to the throne, as the young emperor was still alive. But, being greatly overpowered by numbers, they were manacled, and the party proceeded towards the palace inhabited by the emperor and his parents. The armed fuite by this time confifted of feveral hundred men. All they met on the way were preffed to join the train that nothing might be betrayed, and in this manner they reached the palace; where the fentinels were eafily brought to compliance, as the foldiers belonging to the confpirators threatened to use violence unless they voluntarily furrendered. Elizabeth reiterated her remonftrances, and — fhe was obeyed as monarch.

The duke and his fpoufe were now rudely awaked from the profound fleep in which they lay, and dragged out of bed — the latter being fcarcely allowed time to cover herfelf with a gown, while the former, having had recourfe to weapons, was carried by the foldiers, wrapped in the bed-clothes, put in the fledge, into which they then threw fome garments, and both were now conveyed away, as prifoners of Elizabeth, into the palace of that princefs, where they were ftrongly guarded. Ivan, the innocent unconfcious confcious boy, in whofe name already fo many manifestos had appeared, of which he could neither understand nor know anything; who, with no ambition to flatter, had been raifed to the imperial purple, and was now without conflernation dethroned, was gently fleeping in his cradle, during this transaction, which doomed him to a life of mifery. Elizabeth had given orders not to difturb his repofe, and feveral foldiers affiduoufly flood watching his cradle; but immediately on his awaking Elizabeth took him with her to her palace, that fhe might fhew him to his father and mother. - Not only the young emperor and his parents, but alfo the two grand promoters of Ivan's fucceffion and the regency of Anne, Oftermann, and Munich *, were carried off without much noife that fame night, and on the marshal was literally retaliated what he had done to Biren duke of Courland. Thus, under favour of the darknefs and filence of the night, this great revolution was effected at Petersburg. The emperor Ivan and his parents were now in captivity to a princefs, whofe clemency was their only hope. The inhabitants of the refidence heard early in the morning of the important, though not altogether unexpected, revolution; and, as only one year before,

* In the month of June, in this year, he had been elected duke of Courland, and thereupon went to St. Peterfburg, there to wait for the ratification of his election by the king and the republic of Poland. In the mean time the revolution happened, by which his brother and his family were reduced to mifery. Lewis too was treated at first like a prifoner; but this lasted not long. In February 1742 he quitted St. Peterfburg, and went back to Brunfwick.

† Marshal Munich was brought to his trial on a charge of having expended too much money on the army, and of having been the death of a great number of foldiers in gaining his victories. This is exactly fimilar to the process brought by cardinal Richelieu against the marshal de Marillac. Munich, irritated at the interrogatories of his judges, faid to them: " Draw up yourfelves the answers " you would have me to make and I will figu them." — They took him at his word; he figned the paper, and was condemned to be quartered.

" the life-guards, had unanimoufly invited her, " for the prevention of all the mifchievous con-" fequences to be apprehended, to take pof-" feffion of the throne of her father as neareft " by right of birth, and that fhe had accordingly " refolved to yield to this unanimous request of " her faithful fubjects, by taking poffeffion of <sup>ss</sup> her inheritance derived from her parents the " emperor Peter I. and the emprefs Catharine."

Another manifesto appeared shortly after of greater length, in which the legitimacy of Elizabeth's acceffion to the throne was chiefly grounded on the testament of the empress Catharine I. her mother. In this it was faid, " that on the de-" mife of Peter II. when the ought to have " fucceeded *, by Oftermann's malice against " her.

* This, however, is not in firict conformity with truth. This testament has been mentioned above, p. 204. Had Elizabeth now intended to act in complete purfuance of it, the would have caufed the young duke of Holftein, Peter, to come to Ruffia and had him crowned emperor, and fhe might have remained his guardian and regent of the empire till his majority, he being now only thirteen. This, however, fhe did not, but referved the throne, which it would have been dangerous for her to have afcended ; though the next year [1742] fhe invited the fame duke, Peter of Holftein, her fifter's fon, to Ruffia, and appointed him her fucceffor. - Befides, Elizabeth's acceffion to the throne was even even a proof that Peter the Great's law, by which the fovereign was at liberty to appoint a fucceffor, would become only a fource of alterations in the fucceffion and of revolutions in the government. Elizabeth therefore appealed to Catharine's teftament. — The empress Anne had come to the crown contrary to the purport of this teftament, but as empress had alfo the right to nominate her fucceffor. It is faid, indeed, in Elizabeth's manifesto, that Anne, from extreme weakness, figned a testament forged by Oftermann; but Ivan was certainly appointed fucceffor by Anne, a few weeks before her death.

* This muft, however, have founded very outlandifh in the ears of a true born Ruffian, and fhewn the cafe of Ivan and his parents as ftrange, and their claim to the throne as invalid.

" throne. That Ivan was, therefore, by the " machinations of Oftermann and Munich, " confirmed emperor in October 1740; and " becaufe the feveral regiments of guards, as se well as the marching regiments, were under " the command of Munich and the father of " Ivan, and confequently the whole force of " the empire was in the hands of these two per-" fons, the fubjects were compelled to take the " oath of allegiance to Ivan. However this was not done; neither Anne, nor her hufband, nor her fon Ivan ever faw Germany again: and this appears to be the propereft place briefly to relate the fubfequent fortunes of this unhappy family.

On

On the twelfth of December they were conducted from St. Peterfburg, and arrived at Riga the 6th of January 1742, from which place it was their most earnest wish to proceed to Germany, preparations having already been made at Berlin for their reception *. Elizabeth, however, had in the interim changed her mind, and detained them there in cuftody; in order by their means, as was reported, to obtain an elucidation of feveral matters which fhe wanted to have explained. The princely captives made two feveral attempts to efcape: but both were frustrated; and, as was reasonable to expect, were followed by a clofer confinement in the citadel of Riga, where they now could only enjoy the open air in the garden, and were kept under the infpection of a numerous command. Applications were made to no purpose by the courts of Berlin, Vienna, and London for their enlargement: though Elizabeth would have yielded to their follicitations to fet the duke at liberty, but Anne and the children fhe was abfolutely determined not to liberate; and only on that condition would Anthony Ulric accept of a deliverance. Some attempts being afterwards discovered, even at St. Petersburg, to dethrone Elizabeth, and to recall the former administrators of the government, the empress was still more embittered against the ejected family. Thev were conveyed [1743] to Dunamund, where their imprisonment was still closer and more fevere: from this fortrefs they were removed to Kolmogory, an ifland at the mouth of the Dvina in the White-fea, about fifty miles from Archangel. Here Anne died in child-bed in 1746, a prey to grief and melancholy, principally owing to the privation of her eldeft fon Ivan, who had been taken from his parents and fhut up in a monastery at Oranienburg. Her hufband furvived till 1775, when he finished his calamitous career in prifon. The death of Anne feemed for a moment to affuage the refentment of the implacable monarch: fhe caufed the corpfe to be brought to St. Peterfburg, where it was deposited with due rites in the imperial fepulchre, and fhe herfelf attended the interment.

The dethroned Ivan continued to live from 1744, far from his parents in the monaftery at Oranienburg, where he was brought up in fuch feclufion that his mental powers were left totally unemployed. He was not allowed either to write or to read. A monk of the convent T 4 thought thought to make his fortune by carrying off the unfortunate prince; but the attempt was attended by ruin to himfelf, and additional horror to the doleful fituation of Ivan. Being taken at Smolenfk, they were brought back, and poor Ivan was made dearly to explate the project that had been undertaken without his knowledge or confent. A dungeon in the caftle of Schluffelburg was now affigned him for his difinal abode; and he was here fo clofely immured, that he might be faid to be literally buried alive in a fubterranean vault into which no beam of the fun could ever ftray, paffing his time in total inaction, by the gloomy light of a lamp, which fo far from cheering his mind feemed calculated only to plunge it into deeper defpair, by fhewing him fomewhat more diffinctly the horrors of his fituation. He rarely knew whether it was day or night, any more than what was the hour; feldom could the officers and foldiers that were on guard, for the fake of mitigating a little the cruelty of his fituation, transiently converse with him on the most indifferent topics: for all difcourfe with him was utterly forbidden. He could fcarcely ever obtain permifion to behold for a few moments the bleffed light of heaven, and to breathe the free air in the inclosed court of the fortress. How can the least doubt doubt be entertained, that the mind of this prince, by fuch a courfe of life, must take a direction peculiar to itfelf, bordering on defpondency, fullennefs, mifanthropy, abfence, and confusion *? He occurred frequently to the * Catharine II. likewife converfed with him once unknown, and the following was the refult of this vifit, as published in a manifesto of that time : " After we had " afcended the throne, and offered up to heaven our just " thankfgivings, the first object that employed our thoughts, in confequence of that humanity which is natural to us, " was the unhappy fituation of that prince, who was de-" throned by the divine providence, and had been unfortu-" nate ever fince his birth; and we formed the refolution " of alleviating his misfortunes, as far as was poffible. We " immediately made a vifit to him, in order to judge of his " understanding and talents; and, in confequence thereof, " to procure him an agreeable and quiet fituation, fuitable " to his character, and the education he had received. " But how great was our furprise, when, befides a defect " in his utterance, that was uneafy to himfelf, and rendered " his difcourfe almost unintelligible to others, we observed " in him a total privation of fense and reason! Those who " accompanied us, during this interview, faw how much our * heart fuffered at the contemplation of an object fo fitted to " excite compaffion; they were also convinced, that the " only meafure we could take to fuccour the unfortunate " prince, was to leave him where we found him, and to " procure him all the comforts and conveniencies that his " fituation would admit of. We accordingly gave our " orders for this purpole, though the flate he was in pre-" vented

the thoughts of Elizabeth, who caufed him twice to be brought fecretly to St. Peterfburg, where fhe talked with him, without letting him know who fhe was; but, for his liberation, for the alleviation of his horrible - unmerited doom, fhe did nothing. Peter III. who fhortly after his accession, went and made him a visit likewife, without being known to Ivan, in the determination fomewhat to better his condition, by granting him the fmall boon he requefted, the enjoyment of the free air within the caftle. Peter accordingly gave orders to build a fmall houle, for the accommodation of the prince, in an angle of the fortrefs; but his own death defeated this laudable purpose. Two years afterwards, Ivan alfo was cruelly affaffinated, and thus fuddenly delivered from a life that had afforded him, from his very birth, fo few fatisfactions, being rather one continued tiffue of calamities and forrow.

" vented his perceiving the marks of our humanity, or " being fenfible of our attention and care; for he knew " nobody, could not diftinguish between good and evil, nor " did he know the use that might be made of reading, to " pais the time with lefs wearines and difgust; on the con-" trary, he fought after pleasure in objects that discovered, " with fufficient evidence, the disorder of his imagination." See Life of Catharine II. vol. i. p. 504, fourth edit.

A lieu.

A lieutenant, named Mirovitch, thinking himself neglected as an officer, conceived a plan to revenge himfelf on the empress Catharine II. by delivering the captive Ivan from his dungeon, and replacing him on the throne. A plan, which, befides the extraordinary difficulties with which it must be attended, feemed utterly unlikely to fucceed; as the manner of life to which that prince had all along been condemned, difqualified him for ever for the ftation of a ruler. Yet Mirovitch, capable of any attempt, however inconfiderate, to which he was prompted by his vindictive spirit, found means to gain over a few accomplices to his rafh defign. The empress being gone on a journey into Livonia in 1764, and he happening then to have a command at Schluffelburg, for ftrengthening the guard at that fortrefs, whereby he had frequent opportunities for making himfelf thoroughly acquainted with the place of Ivan's confinement, caufed the foldiers of his command to be rouzed in the night, and read to them a pretended order from the empress commissioning him to fet the prince at liberty.

The foldiers thus taken by furprife, were induced by threats, promifes, and intoxicating liquors, to believe, what however on the flighteft reflection must have struck them as the groffest absurdity. Headed

ń

Headed by Mirovitch, they proceeded to the cell of lvan. The commandant of the fortrefs, waked out of his fleep by the unexpected alarm, immediately on his appearing, received a blow with the butt end of a mufket, which ftruck him to the ground; and the two officers that had the guard of the prifoner were ordered to fubmit. Here it is to be obferved, that the officers whofe turn it was to have cuftody of him, had uniformly, from the time of Elizabeth, fecret orders given them, that if any thing fhould be attempted in favour of the prince, rather to put him to death than fuffer him to be carried off. They now thought themselves in that dreadful predicament: and the prince, who when an infant of nine weeks, was taken from the calm repofe of the cradle to be placed on an imperial throne, was likewife fast locked in the arms of fleep when that throne was taken from him only one year afterwards, and now alfo enjoying a fhort respite from milery by the fame kind boon of nature, when he was awakened - by the thruft of a fword; and, notwithstanding the brave refistance he made, closed his eyes for ever by the frequent repetition of the ftroke. Such was the lamentable end of this unfortunate prince! of this ruffian monarch! The event excited great animadverfion throughout the refidence, every unbiaffed unbiaffed perfon bewailed the youth fo innocently put to death; and inceffant crowds of people flocked to fee his body in the church of the fortrefs of Schluffelburg. The government was at length obliged to fteal it away by night for inhumation in a monaftery at a confiderable diffance from town. Mirovitch paid the forfeit of his enterprife with his head *.

We shall now refume the thread of our history.

Whatever feverity the emprefs Elizabeth fhewed against the deposed regent, her spoule, and their family, and though she had banished the chiefs of the late administration, Oftermann and Munich, to Siberia; yet, on the other hand, she recalled many thousands who had been sent to pine out their days in those dreary regions, under the late regency; among whom were even two Dolgorukies, whom she reinstated in their posts. What Munich and Oftermann had been, under the foregoing governments, Bestu-

* Ivan had fill two brothers and two fifters, who remained in prifon with their parents, three of them being born during their imprifonment. It was not till the year 1776 that they were permitted by Catharine II. to go to Horfens in Yutland, to their aunt the dowager queen Juliana of Denmark, on which occasion the empress fettled on them a pension.

chef was now. As the friend of Biren he had been exiled with him, but, on Munich's difgrace, was liberated and recalled by the regent Anne. Elizabeth appointed him now vice-chancellor, and foon after promoted him to the high office of grand-chancellor; in which flation he for many years fucceffively directed the affairs of the ruffian government, almost entirely at his own will.

Elizabeth, defirous of making herfelf beloved throughout the nation, by reftoring all things as they had been under Peter I. reinftated the directing fenate eftablifhed by that monarch, but whofe province had been very much contracted by the council erected by Catharine I. and afterwards by the cabinet under Anne, in its full privilege of conducting the affairs of the country, and fixed the number of its members at fourteen. The foreign concerns were moftly managed by the chancellor Cherkafkoy and Beftuchef, afterwards by the latter alone: fhe alfo erected a council of conference. [1756.]

It was expected that Elizabeth would proceed to fulfil her fecond promife, of keeping, as much as poffibie, all foreigners from holding offices under government: but this had like to have been attended with very fad confequences, as a more extensive interpretation was given to it, than was intended by that princefs. The guards, for the most part natives, were particularly incenfed at the foreign officers. Elizabeth, to fhew her gratitude to the preobrajenski guards for the affiftance they had given her in mounting the throne, had honoured the troop of grenadiers with the name of the life-company, increafed them to 300 men, appointed herfelf their colonel, affigning at the fame time to every common man the rank of nobleffe and of lieutenant, and to the petty officers and officers of this company an equality with those of higher rank in the army. Intoxicated with these marks of favour, they confidered them as the bare reward of their great fervices; and fuppofing themfelves now the favourites of the empress, they rioted in all kinds of exorbitances, extorting money from wealthy perfons, maltreating every body who did not act just as they would have him, and behaving with the greatest rudeness and infolence, particularly to the foreigners in the army. Nay, while the empress was at Mosco, they proceeded fuch lengths that they even formed the mad refolution to murder all the foreigners; which, indeed, they began to put in execution, by attacking and wounding feveral. Elizabeth, therefore, was under the neceffity of using harsh methods, and of making declaration, " that fhe was fo far from tolerating se this

The war with the king of Sweden, which had been begun under the late regency, was not yet terminated, and at prefent only interrupted by both armies retiring into quarters for the winter. The Swedes, indeed, entertained great hopes from the new emprefs, to whofe acceffion they thought they had greatly co-operated by their manifesto. The french ambasfador at St. Petersburg, whom the emprefs very much efteemed, likewife employed every effort to work upon Elizabeth in their favour, and a ceffation of hostilities was obtained at the opening of the year 1742, during which it was intended to negotiate a peace. But Elizabeth proved far more uncomplying than Sweden had expected. Sweden required the treaty of Nystadt to be annulled, or 21 at leaft have all Finland and Vyborg given back. Elizabeth, however, having but just acceded to the throne of Peter the Great, her father, was not inclined to give up those countries, which he, after toilsome exertions, had ravished from Sweden. She eafily perceived that, in fo doing, fhe would have badly recommended herfelf to the nation, and would have acted just as unwifely as Peter III. afterwards did, when, at the very commencement of his reign, he fhewed his magnanimity towards the king of Pruffia. But, as Sweden might poffibly have been requested by Leftocq to fupport Elizabeth's pretenfions, in cafe of neceffity, with an armed force, and as it was, therefore, now intended to gratify her in this matter, in return for her complaifance, though that necelfity did not occur, yet Elizabeth offered to pay her a confiderable fum of money, if she would confent to make peace, without infifting on any restitution of country. To this propofal Sweden would not comply; thinking, though on what grounds it is impossible to imagine, unless the was in expectation, perhaps, of a counter-revolution, that she had a right to demand more: and, therefore, hostilities, which had been interrupted by the armiftice till the first of March, on the expiration of that term were renewed. Though the Swedes had acted with fuch incon-VOL. II. ceivable IJ ceivable stupidity in the former campaign, they proceeded in the fame manner now; and the total ignorance in the art of war, that had been fhewn by their commanders then, was no lefs flagrant on the prefent occafion. The fwedifh troops were fo carelefsly difperfed in winterquarters, at great diftances from each other, that they were not nearly all affembled, when Lafcy had again made an incursion into Finland; and even after they had completed their junction, the Swedes behaved with fo little bravery, that they abandoned one fortified place after another, to the purfuing Ruffians, till they were at length furrounded by the enemy near Helfingfors. They had even, according to cuftom in thefe campaigns, refolved to retreat from thence to Abo; but a boor of Finland betrayed to the ruffian general another way to Abo, by which he might reach that place before the Swedes. The Ruffians took that road; and the Swedes, now cut off from Abo, were obliged to turn back to the walls of Helfingfors. Here they for fome time kept up a communication with Sweden; but of this likewife they were foon deprived by the ruffian fleet.

-During this campaign Elizabeth alfo made an attempt to draw off the Finns entirely from Sweden. In a manifesto which she caused to be dispersed, dispersed, she accused the swedish government of " having begun an unjuft war; and though the " empress had confented to an armiftice, and " offered to come to terms of accommodation, " yet the court of Sweden infifted on war. " Though certainly the whole kingdom was " not pacifically inclined, yet fhe was perfuaded " that the inhabitants of Finland, who fuffered " most by the war, were heartily defirous of " peace. The empress, therefore, made them " the propofal, that they fhould remain quiet " during the war, neither acting inimically " against the Russians, nor giving fuccour to " the Swedes - if they agreed to this, then " Elizabeth would affift them in becoming a " free and independent nation, living in future " under the protection of Ruffia." Ruffia indeed might hope, and have reafon to expect, that if Finland were once under ruffian protection, it might foon be converted into a ruffian province, and then its independence would not certainly be alarming to its neighbours, or its liberty dangerous to itfelf. In confequence of this, the king of Sweden published a countermanifesto, admonishing the Finns " not to " fuffer themfelves to be milled by empty pro-" mifes of future independence, but to continue " happy in the enjoyment of their prefent con-U 2 " ftitution

HISTORY OF RUSSIA.

" flitution under fwedifh fupremacy," aiming thereby, and by the declaration, that Elizabeth herfelf had broken the truce, to efface the impreffion of the ruffian manifefto.

In the meantime, that manifesto had not been fo diligently dispersed, without making some impression; and, though the Finns took no measures, yet Sweden could not be altogether fecure that they might not hearken to the offers of Russia. However, the ravages and devastations committed by the russian troops in Finland, were by no means calculated to give the Finns a very pleasing idea of the russian superacy. Upwards of two hundred villages, besides fingle houses, were burnt by the russians.

The fwedifh army being furrounded near Helfingfors, and deprived of all means of forcing a paffage through the ruffian troops, both by land and water, no hope of deliverance was left, but by negotiation. The two fwedifh generals, Levenhaupt and Buddembrok, who were reputed at Stockholm to be the authors of the unfavourable polition of the army, were difinified by the government, and the command was given to another officer, who thought he could do nothing better than capitulate. Thus, the fwedifh troops, lately fo confident of vanquishing the Ruffians, were now fatisfied with being allowed - - 1.1

allowed to return with their arms to Sweden, under promife of taking no farther fhare in 'the war, fo long as it should last. This was certainly an event, least of all expected by the fwedifh government, though their whole conduct during the war rendered it most probable; and Sweden was at prefent compelled to make peace whenever Ruffia should be inclined to confent to it. Finland being in the hands of the Ruffians, the fwedish army in part tied up from ferving, the Finns obliged to remain inactive, and the Dalecarlians refusing to enlift, it was easy for the Ruffians to prefs forward into Sweden: Elizabeth, however, was more difposed to a pacification than to continue the war, but, availing herfelf of the advantages gained by her foldiers. would hearken to no other terms, than the evacuation of a great part of Finland by the Swedes.

The Swedes were now reduced to no fmall perplexity, as Ruffia had a right to infift on the hardeft conditions: they faw no means of evafion. Fortunately for them, just at this juncture, an accidental circumstance arose, which occasioned Ruffia to agree to an equitable accommodation; and this was no other than a fudden resolution adopted in Sweden, as the king was entirely childles, to fettle the succession during his lifetime. For the fake of gaining U 3 favour with the empress Elizabeth, the diet made choice of the young duke of Holftein Gottorp, Anthony Peter Ulric, as heir to the fwedifh throne. Prior to this, however, Elizabeth had invited that prince into Ruffia, for the purpofe of making him her fucceffor. Peter received a deputation from Sweden, with an offer to him of the throne of their country - but he had already undergone the ceremony of conversion to the orthodox greek church, and Elizabeth was not inclined to let him quit Ruffia: he, therefore, thanked the fwedish nation for their kind intentions, and remained in Ruffia. Could he but have had a glimpfe into futurity, how different must have been his refolution! In confequence of this refufal, Elizabeth recommended the Swedes to choose her relation, the bishop of Lubeck, uncle to Peter III. for their king; and the Swedes had reafon to expect a peace on moderate terms, if they complied with the wifh of Elizabeth.

The majority of the Swedish nation, however, had no inclination for this candidate proposed to them by Russia. There was, on the contrary, every appearance that Denmark and Sweden would again be united, as most of the Swedes were defirous of having the hereditary prince of Denmark on their throne; and the Dalecarlians even broke out in open infurrection on that account, account, rushed into the capital, and furiously infifted on the election of the danish prince. Denmark, who wished for a renewal of the treaty of Kalmar, made a number of apparently advantageous propofals; and Ruffia, therefore, feeing the negotiation for peace was likely to be delayed, took up arms again in the year 1743, in order to profecute the war with vigour. In this campaign it was refolved to attempt fome great exploit with the fleet; but, as an armament was also fitted out by Sweden, the Ruffians contented themfelves with making a few inconfiderable defcents on the enemy's coafts. In July the election of the future king was to come on at Stockholm; and a fwedifh ambaffador, who was negotiating a peace with the ruffian commiffioners at Abo, at length, by a ftratagem, took advantage of the approaching election, to determine the Ruflians for peace, by pretending that Denmark was using efforts to frustrate the measures of the present congress, in order to carry on her own defigns; and, as the Ruffians were abfolutely bent on making no compliances, he broke up the meeting. This the ruffian delegates had not expected; but now, for the fake of gratifying the wilhes of their fovereign, concluded a peace, by which Elizabeth reftored the greater part of Finland, occupied by her troops, · U.4.

on condition, that the bishop of Lubeck should be appointed fucceffor. The news of the peace arrived at Stockholm just before the election; the Dalecarlians were driven by the foldiers to Paaren; on the 4th of July Adolphus Frederic, duke of Holftein and bifhop of Lubeck, was elected king of Sweden, and the fucceffion fettled in his posterity; and, in August, the peace between Ruffia and Sweden was fully ratified. Though the conditions of peace were now, after the war was terminated, of a very different kind from those, which only two years before had been framed previous to the commencement of it; yet the Swedes had reafon to think themfelves very fortunate that, by the pleafure which Elizabeth shewed at the election of her kinfman to the fucceffion, they were enabled to procure to themfelves better terms than they had otherwife reafon to expect. The treaty of Nystadt, which the Swedes were fo earnest to have annulled, was now adopted as the bafis of the prefent, and they moreover agreed to give up the province of Kymmenegard in Finland, with Frederickshamm and Vilmannstrand, befides feveral other places, and all the harbours at the exit of the Kymmene, together with the islands to the fouth and to the west of that river. On the other hand, Sweden obtained the reftitution of

of all the places occupied by Ruffia during the war, and the boundaries of both territories were fettled anew. The inhabitants of the part of Finland ceded to Ruffia, were fecured in their privileges and immunities, as well as in the exercise of their religion, and the Swedes were allowed to export, years of short harvest excepted, to the value of 80,000 rubles of corn in the harbours of the gulf of Finland, to those of the Baltic, duty free, Thus Elizabeth, immediately in the first years of her reign, enlarged the borders of the empire; and, as Anne had promoted the election of king Augustus III. fo Elizabeth very clearly displayed her influence in the choice of a fovereign for the neighbouring kingdom of Sweden.

Whatever pains the french ambaffador at St. Peterfburg had taken to draw off Ruffia from the auftrian party, and how furely foever this was to have been expected, as the auftrian ambaffador was implicated in the abovementioned connection, which had for its object to replace Anne upon the throne, yet Beftuchef, who was devoted to the houfe of Auftria, had the addrefs fo to guide the inclinations of the emprefs, that fhe continued in her adherence to its interefts; and, in 1747, fent troops to Germany to the affiftance of Maria Therefa, by which means the peace of Aix-la-chapelle was brought on. The friendfhip fhip fubfifting between the two imperial courts, was now gradually becoming more firmly cemented from day to day: fo that, notwithftanding the efforts of the king of Pruflia to preferve a good underftanding with Ruflia, yet the party devoted to Auftria at the ruffian court found means to defeat all his endeavours; and the emprefs of Germany, Maria Therefa, experienced in Elizabeth a friend and ally, no lefs faithful to her interefts than the emprefs Catharine I. and both the Annes had proved to her predeceffors.

It is true that Elizabeth and Frederic formed an alliance in 1743, and harmony feemed to prevail between them; it was, however, of very fhort duration, being continually undermined by Frederic's opponents at the court of Peterfburg, till by their unwearied efforts it was at length totally annihilated, and averfion and hostility fucceeded to its place. No longer time after than 1745, when the king of Pruffia requefted the empress to guarantee the treaty of Drefden, fhe rejected his application, under the flimfy pretence, that she had already too many guarantees on her hands. If hence it was to be concluded, that Frederic was not on the beft terms with Ruffia, he had reafon to think himfelf still more hurt by a treaty entered into between the courts of Petersburg and Vienna in in 1746, which though it was communicated to him as nothing more than an alliance for the purpose of mutual affistance, and by no means relating to measures of aggression or offence to a third; from which, however, it was very foon eafy to infer what the king of Pruffia had to look for from Ruffia. - Rumours were now much abroad concerning an approaching rupture between Pruffia and Auftria. They were, however, publicly contradicted by both courts, who declared that no mifunderstanding had arifen between them. It was undeniable neverthelefs, that Ruffia, the ally of Auftria, was fecretly making dispositions for war, and that both courts were using their efforts to draw the king of Poland and elector of Saxony into the confederacy, which might prefently, from a defensive, be converted into an offensive alliance, by means whereof Auftria indulged the hopes of regaining Silefia. Augustus, however, hefitated to accede, as the hazard to him was by far the greateft.

Leftocq, who had been the moft forward of all that affifted Elizabeth in obtaining the crown, whom flue had appointed to be director-general of the medicine-department throughout the empire, with a falary of 7000 rubles, ufually interfered in matters of flate; and thereby, but particularly

All the time he was at court he had uniformly diffuaded the emprefs from breaking with Pruffia. No fooner was he difgraced but all poffible means were employed afrefh to excite difcord between Elizabeth and Frederic.

A paffage in the writings of the king of Pruffia, where he makes the mother of the emprefs to have been the wife of a petty officer, a free remark on Elizabeth's manner of life which once efcaped him while fitting at table with the ruffian ambaffador, and being, as ufual, magnified by report, made Elizabeth the per-fonal enemy of Frederic; and, as he was generally suspected of aiming to get possession of Courland and Polish-Prussia, it was certainly not furprifing that Elizabeth was ever drawing clofer the connection with Auftria against Pruffia, notwithstanding the numerous endeavours of the pruffian party at St. Peterfburg, to maintain the bond of amity between Frederic and the ruffian monarch. - In the year 1750 the emprefs recalled her ambaffador, without many apologies, from the court of Berlin, and Frederic followed her example with his minister at Petersburg. In 1753 it was agreed between Ruffia and Auftria, not only to refift all farther augmentation of the prussian power, but also to use efforts to reduce it; and in 1755 they refolved to put themfelves in fuch a condition as fhould enable them at all times to attack Pruffia, or in, cafe of an attack from that quarter, to refift it with energy.

It is well known that Frederic, from whom this combination againft him could not long be kept fecret, thought it the beft courfe he could take to go refolutely to meet his foes and anticipate their attack; that in 1756 he gave the fignal of war by an incurfion into Saxony; and Elizabeth, for five years, took a very active part in the wonderful conteft of feven years which was entered into in behalf of Maria Therefa, Therefa, and would have been more fenfibly, and perhaps fatally felt by Frederic, had not the grand-duke, appointed by Elizabeth as her fucceffor, been his friend, which had this confequence, that Elizabeth's orders, which tended to the ruin of Frederic, were not all fo punctually fulfilled as they otherwife would have been, that likewife many who were employed in military affairs were very tender of hurting that monarch, in order to gain the approbation of the future fovereign Peter III. and accordingly rather chofe to act in conformity with the fecret inftructions of the grand-duke than to adhere to the commands of the emprefs.

In the first year of that war [1756] the Ruffians had taken no fhare whatever in the contestbetween Frederic and Maria Therefa, begun by the former, and in which Saxony was fo unfortunately involved. They first began to march in the following year [1757] to humble Frederic in the name and by the orders of their empress; and, which was thought to be highly possible, to gain possession of the kingdom of Pruffia. From a variety of impediments * it was not till the month of July that the ruffian troops appeared before Memel, and made themfelves masters of that city. From the moment of their entering on the pruffian territory, this army not only betrayed a great want of difcipline, but particularly their light corps, confifting of Kozaks, Kalmuks, and Tartars, behaved like real barbarians *. The cruelties which they committed on the inhabitants of that kingdom, were fuch as had never been heard of in the military hiftory of Europe for upwards of a thousand years. The ruffian commanders themfelves were fenfible that it was no honour to them to be at the head of an army which brought on them the guilt of fuch proceedings. Several of them ufed every means in their power to put a ftop to thefe enormities; but it was not poffible to fucceed: and, as in confequence of these barbarities, all perfons fled at the approach of fo unprincipled an enemy, it was extremely difficult for the Ruffians to prolong their ftay in Pruffia from the total want of the neceffary means of fubfiftence in a country where thehufbandmen deferted the land before them.

* The little town of Goldap on the frontiers was first plundered of everything and then burnt. The officers themfelves fet a very bad example. An adjutant wantonly fet a village in flames through which the troops were to march, thereby fubjecting the Russians themfelves to the utmost danger in case the fparks had fallen on the powderweggons. An

An army of 24,000 men under the command of field-marshal Lehvald was all the force that Frederic had been able to leave behind him in Pruffia for oppofing his new enemy, the Ruffians, whole strength confisted in upwards of 100,000 combatants; and yet the marshal had the boldnefs to quit his camp at Vehlau, where he was fo uncommonly well entrenched and fecure, that the enemy would not have ventured to attack him with all their fuperiority of numbers, to go and give battle to the Ruffians on the 30th of August at a place called Norkitten, not far from Grofyægerfdorf. Revenge for the inhuman devastations everywhere perpetrated by the Ruffians now infpired the pruffian foldiers with valour and intrepidity. The pruffian army, animated, not by the thirst of conquest, but by a genuine patriotic zeal to defend their country, rushed like angry lions on the favage hordes, who thought they had no reafon to fear that the little pruffian army would feek an opportunity for coming to an engagement with them. Fortune feemed at first to declare in favour of the brave defenders of their country; towards the end of the battle, however, the Ruffians gained the advantage, and the Pruffians were forced to leave them mafters of the field. The Ruffians were therefore conquerors; but, as they neglected to follow up their victory, chusing chufing rather to repose upon their laurels, they left the Pruffians to retreat unmolefted. General Lehvald therefore retired in excellent order, without being purfued, having killed five times more of the enemy than he had loft of his own men, and more formidable after his defeat than the Ruffians after their victory; befides, it was impoffible for the latter to ftay longer in a country which they themfelves had ravaged and laid wafte, they were alfo obliged to retreat in their turn, in order to escape that most dreadful of all foes to an army, famine. Nay, by a strange concatenation . f circumstances, field-marshal Apraxin, whose troops had occupied a very great part of Prufiia, was at length induced entirely to abandon that kingdom, after leaving behind him a fingle garrifon in the frontier-fort of Memel. The fame barbarities and cruelties, as those with which the Ruffians had tarnished their honour on their entrance into Pruffia, they now exercifed at their departure; and finoking or burnt villages, mangled carcafes, and crippled people marked the road they took. This extraordinary retreat, however, of fo great an army, fo lately victorious, and being ftill poffeffed of a good fea-port in the country, was an event fo totally unexpected that it aftonished all Europe, and drew complaints not VOL. II. x only only from Auftria but alfo from the other courts coalesced against Frederic, fince it was not forced on by the fuperiority of the pruffian troops, but voluntarily determined by the Ruffians, and fo quickly and hastily executed that they even left behind them in Pruffia a part of the baggage and a great number of cannon. The true motives of this retreat having never been hitherto affigned, they shall here have a place. Count Beftuchef, grand chancellor of Ruffia, who had for feveral years been Elizabeth's right hand, was no friend to the grand-duke, afterwards Peter III. but entirely devoted to Auftria, as Peter on the other hand always espoufed the party of Frederic. Elizabeth, just at this time, lay fo dangeroufly ill, that her phyficians began to doubt of her recovery. Bestuchef thereupon conceived the plan, in cafe Elizabeth fhould die, to exclude the grand-duke from the government, and to place upon the throne his fon the prefent emperor Paul Petrovitch, under the guardianship of his mother the late empress Catharine II. То this end, however, it was neceffary that he fhould have the troops at hand in order to use them in cafe of need, and the rather as their commander Apraxin was entirely at his devotion. In the meantime Elizabeth recovered; and, on inquiring after her army in Pruffia, was not a little little exafperated on hearing that it was entirely . , withdrawn from that country. The austrian and french ambaffadors preferred heavy complaints to the empress concerning the orders for retreating, which Bestuchef had transmitted unknown to her; the grand-duke Peter likewife did what he could to incenfe the emprefs againft Befluchef: and thus the combined efforts of the two feveral parties, with the great delays at the opening of the campaign, and this unaccountable retreat, gave the empress ground to fuspect ' that fhe had been betrayed by her ministers or her generals. Marshal Apraxin was therefore removed from the command and put under arreft. He justified his conduct by the express orders of count Bestuchef. Bestuchef was removed from his office and put under arreft alfo. Count Vorontzof fucceeded Bestuchef in his employment, and the generals Brown and Fermor took the command of the army in the place of Apraxin, who was fent as a prifoner to Narva *. The empress also appointed a commiffion from ambition and the luft of dominion, meddled in matters that did not concern him; with having at various times neglected to obey the orders of her majefty when they were not agreeable to him; with frequently iffuing decrees without previoufly confulting the emprefs ; with having flandered the grand-duke and grand-duchefs to her, and endeavoured to incenfe the emprefs against them. He was banished to a village belonging to him 102 miles from Mosco, and thus became another striking example of the instability and lubricity of fortune in courts. The modern hiftory of Ruffia in general prefents a feries of difcarded favourites who were all repaid the measure they had meted to others. All of them, as long as they flood befide the throne, as long as their will and their fentence could honour or condemn, made free ufe of that privilege, and all of them at last met the fame condemnation. Here we cannot but recollect, that Mentshikof was turned out by the Dolgorukis, and thefe in their turn experienced a more terrible fate at the infligation of Biren. But also exile awaited Biren ; and Munich, who procured it for him, escaped it not himfelf. Leftocg and Befluchef exulted in the fall of Munich ; Befluchef found means to bring about the downfall of Leftocq, in fpite of Elizabeth's attachment to him; but neither did he enjoy his triumph long, and fell at the very time when he thought himfelf moft fecure !

The Ruffians having thus in the first campaign burnt and destroyed every place to which they came, and pillaged and ravaged wherever they went, carrying off numbers of the inhabitants of Pruffia, murdering and maiming others, and gained a battle without reaping any benefit from it, but rapidly retreated out of the hostile country occupied by them, thereby furnishing the enemy with an opportunity of employing the force opposed to them elsewhere: the whole of this year's campaign, therefore, was in no respect to their honour as european warriors of the eighteenth century.

Bestuchef's fall, however, produced no alteration in the fentiments of Elizabeth in regard to the king of Pruffia; fhe rather refolved to make up in the following year for what had

"the foldiers of the opportunity of running about in parties to rob and plunder, fo much to the feparation and weakening of the army, that it would have been eafy for the purfuing enemy, by encountering and defeating the detached corps, to do them great mifchief. It is not, however, to be denied," continues Weymar, "that in this campaign a certain pufillanimity and fear was confpicuous among the Ruffians; and, though the light troops particularly, were very adventurous in pillaging, they did not behave gallantly in battle against the enemy."

been neglected in the hafty retreat of 1757; and, fo early as January [1758] the Ruffians marched again into Pruffia under the command of general field-marshal Fermor. Not only Kænigsberg, the capital, but the whole kingdom of Prussia, had submitted to them before the end of that month, and continued in their poffeffion during the remainder of the war. In the conquest of which, however, they found no difficulty, as Frederic had not been able to cover that part of his territory. The Ruffians now began to think that the kingdom of Pruffia would foon be incorporated into the dominions of the empress, and form a part of Russia. On this occafion, fo far from repeating the outrages and barbarities of the foregoing campaign, they, contrary to all expectation, behaved with the greatest gentleness, now that they confidered it as already a part of their country, and regarded its inhabitants as their future countrymen *. The inhabitants, who were obliged to fwear fealty to the empress of Russia, were even in doubt themfelves, whether it would ever be poffible for their king, preffed as he was on all fides,

fides, to replace his ic'f in the poffeffion of the country; and accor highly frove by every means to render themfelves agreeable to the Ruffians, in order to reflrain them from a renewal of those calamities under which they had fuffered the year before. - This lenity, however, fhewn by them to the kingdom of Pruffia, which they already looked upon as their own, they foon laid afide, and refumed the old ruffian deportment when once they were got into the other countries of the king, Pomerania and the Mark. Fermor advanced through Pomerania, and made an affault on the fortress of Kustrin in the Neumark, and bombarded the town, contrary to the ufages of war observed by all civilized nations, before he had fent a fummons to the commandant, laying all the houfes and other buildings of the town, within the fpace of a few hours, by a dreadful conflagration, in one fmoking heap of ruins: then, not till two days after, attacked the citadel; and, at length, on the fourth day, fummoned the commandant to furrender. This was rejected with difdain by the governor; and Fermor raifed the fiege on receiving intelligence that the king was advancing in perfon to the defence of his country. The Pruffians, rufhing from Silefia, under the conduct of their king, would doubtlefs have taken bloody revenge

venge on an army of whole inhuman devastations and cruelties fo much had reached their ears, and of which they now, on their arrival in the territories of their king, beheld the melancholy proofs in the confumed villages and towns, the defolated fields, the maimed, illtreated, or impoverished inhabitants prefenting themfelves at every ftep. The king himfelf was fo enraged at the veftiges he perceived on all fides of the barbarous ravages of the Ruffians, and at the accounts that were brought him of the terrible havoc they had committed, that he gave orders not to fpare the life of a fingle Ruffian in the battle that was daily expected to come on; an order which the ruffian general, on being informed of, threatened to retaliate. Marshal Fermor was encamped at Zorndorf, fix miles from Kuftrin, where he was attacked by the king at the head of his army on the 25th of August. The ruffian ranks stood like walls, and tought valiantly: but the military skill of the Pruffians, the valour of a hoft fighting for their country and for the martial glory they had hitherto maintained, and glowing to revenge themfelves on a barbarous enemy, difplayed their amazing effects on the day of that bloody fight; and the generals, Seidlitz and Ziethen in particular, performed miracles of prowefs prowefs with the cavalry. After the battle both armies claimed the victory, but the greatest loss was manifeltly on the part of the Ruffians; they therefore founded their claim on the circumftance of having kept the field *: however this be, the army-cheft, and most of their artillery, fell into the hands of the enemy, who likewife took an extraordinary number of prifoners, amongst whom were feveral officers of the first rank; and, in confequence of this, they foon retreated. Frederic was fill able to thew himfelf the father and benefactor, as well as the protector of his people. In the midft of the devouring wafte of fuch an expensive war, from the funds of his æconomy he was enabled to remit the taxes to those parts of his dominions which had fuffered from the ruffian barbarity: he even advanced money to those whose distresses had been the greateft. It fhould be remembered too, that all this was done while the whole kingdom of Pruffia ftill remained in the hands of the Ruffians.

* It is highly probable that it was their intention to have withdrawn acrofs the Oder, had not the king previoufly caufed all the bridges to be broken down, in the hopes of giving them an entire defeat, and by the demolition of the bridges depriving them of every means of making good their retreat.

The

The court of Petersburg still adhered to its old Tyftem, in fpite of the late ill fuccefs of her arms, and all the efforts of the british minister to with--draw her from her alliance. If fhe had fome lofs of men, it was the leaft lofs fhe could feel : and fhe thought that, while the war was carried on at the expence of others, the reduction of fo near, fo dreaded, and fo hated a rival as the king of Pruffia, and the opportunity of forming her troops to fervice, and perfecting her officers, were objects of confequence enough to keep her clofely attached to her first fentiments. Fermor now undertook the fiege of Colberg, for the purpole of obtaining a commodious depolit for provisions and ammunition; but all in vain: feven hundred of the country militia bravely defended that town against a ruffian corps of feveral thousand men, and the Russians retired, without making this conqueft, to their winterquarters in Pruffia and Poland: even there they were haraffed by the pruffian troops, who destroyed feveral of their magazines.

Poland was henceforth to be the country where the exploits of the next campaign were to be atchieved. Hither, therefore, the Ruffians marched, and hence they afterwards fpread themfelves over all the pruffian territory, [1759] under the command of count Soltikof, who had been been appointed chief of the army, in the room of marshal Fermor *. Frederic's german dominions, and Silefia, became now the fcene of action. Fortified, in fome measure, by the reinforcements he had received, and in purfuance of his orders, general Wedel refolved to attack the Ruffians on their march. They had got to Zulichau towards the latter end of July, and directed their courfe to Kroffen in Silefia, to get before the pruffian army, and to make good the passage of the Oder. The fituation of the Ruffians was very advantageous; posted upon eminences, defended by a powerful artillery, and near feventy thousand strong. The prussian army fell fhort of thirty thousand; and they had greater diladvantages to get over than what arofe from the inferiority of numbers. They had a bridge to pafs, and fuch a narrow defile to ftruggle through, that fcarce a third of a battalion could march in front. The ground was fuch, that the cavalry could not support their infantry. Yet with all thefe difficulties, the attack was long and refolute. But this refolution made their repulfe, which all thefe difadvantages had rendered inevitable, far more bloody and diftrefsiul. Four thousand feven hundred were killed or taken prifoners;

prifoners; and the wounded were, at leaft, three thoufand. The Pruffians were obliged to retire, but they were not purfued; and they paffed the Oder without moleftation. The Ruffians feized upon the towns of Kroffen and Frankfort on the Oder.

Frederic now marched with ten thouland of his beft troops to join the broken army of Wedel, in order to drive this formidable and determined enemy from his country. Prince Henry commanded the remainder of his army, which was too well posted to fear any infult during his absence. The eyes of all were fixed upon his march, and his foldiers who remembered Zorndorf, eagerly longed to try their ftrength once more with the fame antagonists.

Marshal Daun, the austrian general, was not unapprifed of the motion of the Russians, or the defigns of the king of Prussian. He knew that the great defect of the russian troops, was the want of a regular and firm cavalry, which might be depended upon in the day of action. This defect had been a principal cause of their misfortune at Zorndorf the last year; a missfortune which disconcerted all the operations of that campaign. As this was the only want which the Russians were under, fo it was that which Daun was best able to supply at a short warning. With With this view he felected about twelve thousand of his horse, and there is no better horse than that of the Austrians; which, with about eight thousand foot, he placed under the command of general Laudohn, one of the ablest officers in that fervice. This body was divided into two columns, one of which marched through Silesia, and the other through Lusatia. By extreme good fortune and conduct, with little loss or opposition, they both joined the russian army, and were received with transports of joy.

In the meantime, the king of Pruffia, who was unable to prevent this ftroke, joined general Wedel at Muhlrofe, and took upon him the command of the united armies. But, still finding himfelf too weak for the decifive action he was preparing to attempt, he recalled general Finck, whom he had fent fome time before into Saxony with nine thousand men, in order to oppofe the Imperialifts in that country. With these reinforcements he was not able to raife his army to fifty thousand complete. That of the Ruffians, fince the junction of Laudohn, was upwards of ninety thousand. They had befides taken a post, which they had fo strongly entrenched, and defended with fuch a prodigious number of cannon, that it was extremely difficult and hazardous to attempt them ; yet, under these accumulated accumulated difadvantages, it was abfolutely. neceffary that he should fight. The detach-. ments from count Daun's army already menaced Berlin; Saxony, which he was obliged to leave exposed, had become a prey to the Imperialist; and the Ruffians, united with the Auftrians, encamped before his eyes in Silefia, the beft and richest part of his dominions. In short, his former reputation, his present difficulties, his future hopes, every motive of honour and of fafety, demanded an engagement; the campaign hafted to a decifion, and it was evident, that nothing farther could be done by marches and choice of posts. The fanguine temper of other generals has often obliged them to fight under difadvantages; but the king of Pruffia's circumstances were fuch, that, from the multitude of his enemies, he was neither able to confult times nor fituations. Rashness could hardly dictate anything, which, in his condition, would not have been recommended by prudence.

When the attack was refolved, the king's troops put themfelves in motion on the 12th of August, at two in the morning; and, having formed themfelves in a wood, advanced towards the enemy. It was near eleven before the action began. The principal effort of the king of Prussian was against the left wing of the russian army.

army. He began, according to his usual method, with a fierce cannonade; which, having had the effect he defired from it, he attacked that wing with feveral battalions difpofed in columns.

The ruffian entrenchments were forced with great flaughter. Seventy-two pieces of cannon were taken. But still there was a defile to be paffed, and feveral redoubts to be mastered, which covered the village of Kunnersdorf. These were attacked with the fame refolution, and taken one after another. The enemy again made a ftand at the village, and endeavoured there to preferve their ground, by pushing forward feveral battalions of horfe and foot: but their refistance there proved not more effectual than it had done everywhere elfe; they were driven from post to post quite to the last redoubts. For upwards of fix hours fortune favoured the Prussians, who everywhere broke the enemy with an unparalleled flaughter. They had driven them from almost all the ground which they had occupied before the battle; they had taken more than half their artillery : fcarcely anything feemed wanting to the most complete decifion.

The king in those circumstances wrote a billet to the queen, to this effect : " Madam, we have " beat the Ruffians from their entrenchments. 66 In.

" In two hours expect to hear of a glorious " victory." This news arrived at Berlin juft as the poft was going out, and the friends of the king of Prufila throughout Europe, exulted in a certain and conclusive victory. Meantime, fortune was preparing for him a terrible reverse.

The enemy, defeated in almost every quarter, found their left wing, fhattered as it was, to be more entire than any other part of the army. Count Soltikof therefore affembled the remains of his right, and gathered as many as he could from the centre, reinforced that wing, and made a ftand at a redoubt, which had been erected on a very advantageous eminence. No more was wanting to terminate matters in favour of the king, than to drive the Ruffians from this their last hope. But this enterprise was difficult. It was confidently faid, that the pruffian generals were unanimous in their opinion, that they fhould not endeavour at that time to push any farther the advantages they had obtained. They reprefented to the king, that the enemy was still very numerous, their artillery very confiderable, and the post which they occupied of great strength ; that his brave troops, who had been engaged fo long a time, in the feverest action perhaps ever known, and in one of the hotteft days ever felt, were too much exhausted for a new attempt; VOL. II. su an attempt of fuch extreme difficulty, as might daunt even troops that were quite frefh. That the advantage he had gained would be as decifive in its confequences, as that at Zorndorf; and, whilft the enemy filled the gazettes of their party with frivolous difputes of the field of battle, he would be reaping, as he did then, all the effects of an unqueftioned victory. That the enemy would be obliged to retire immediately into Poland, and to leave him at liberty to act in other quarters, where his prefence was full as neceffary.

These reasons were very cogent, and for a few moments they seemed to have some weight with the king. But his character soon determined him to a contrary resolution. He could not bear to be a conqueror by halves. One effort more was alone wanting to that victory, which would free him for ever from the adversary which had leaned heaviest on him during the whole of the war.

Once more he put all to the hazard. His infantry, ftill refolute, and fupported by their late fuccefs, were readily brought to act again. They drew on their bodies, fainting with heat and labour, to a new attack. But the enterprize was beyond their ftrength. The fituation of the enemy was impregnable; and their artillery, which began to be fuperior to that of the Pruflians, Pruffians, on account of the difficulty of the ground, which made it impoffible for the latter to bring up any other than a few fmall pieces, repulfed thefe feeble battalions with a great flaughter. With an aftonifhing, perhaps with a blameable perfeverance, the pruffian infantry were brought to a fecond attack, and were a fecond time repulfed, and with a lofs greater than at firft. Thefe efforts being unfuccefsful, the affair was put to the cavalry. They made redoubled, but ufelefs attacks; the horfes were fpent, as well as thofe they carried.

It was just at that time, when the prussian horfe was wafted by thefe fruitlefs exertions, that the greatest part of the ruffian and the whole body of the auftrian cavalry, which had been hitherto entirely inactive, and was therefore quite fresh, rushed down upon them, broke them to pieces, forced them back upon their foot, and threw the whole into irreparable diforder. The army was univerfally feized with a panic; and in a few minutes those troops, fo lately victorious and irrefiftible, were totally dispersed and defeated. The king did everything to reftore the field, hazarding his perfon, even beyond his former daring, and prodigal of a life he feemed to think ought not to be feparated from conquest. Thrice he led on his troops to the charge; two horfes Y 2 were were killed under him; feveral balls were in his clothes. The utmoft efforts of fkill, courage, and defpair were made, and proved ineffectual: a fingle error outweighed them all. Scarcely a general, hardly an inferior officer in the army was without fome wound. That of general Seidlitz was particularly unfortunate; for to that wound the failure of the horfe, which he commanded, was principally attributed. It was to the fpirit and conduct of this able officer, that a great part of the fuccels at Zorndorf had been owing, in the laft campaign. It is known, that if it had not been for a feafonable movement of the horfe, the whole pruffian army had then been in great danger of a defeat.

The night, and the prudent ufe of fome eminences, which were defended as well as circumflances would admit, preferved the prefian army from total deflruction. However, their lofs was far greater than any which they had fuftained from the beginning of the war. All their cannon was taken. The killed, wounded, and prifoners, by the moft favourable accounts, were near twenty thoufand. General Putkammer was killed on the fpet. Thofe generals, whofe names were fo diffinguifhed in that war, Itzenplitz, Hulfen, Finck, Wedel, and Seidlitz, were among the wounded; as was the prince of . Wurtemberg, Wurtemberg, and five major-generals. The enemy could not have fewer than ten thousand killed on their fide. For hardly ever was fought a more bloody battle.

When the king of Pruffia found himfelf obliged to quit the field, he fent another difpatch to the queen, expressed in this manner: " Re-" move from Berlin with the royal family. Let " the archives be carried to Potfdam. The " town may make conditions with the enemy." It were vain to attempt to draw the picture of the court and city, on the receipt of fuch news, in the midft of the joy which they indulged for the accounts they had received but a few hours before. The terror was increased by the indiffinct relation that foon followed, which gave them only to understand, that their army was totally routed; that there was no account of the king, and that a ruffian army was advancing to take poffeffion of their city.

The day after the battle the king of Pruffia repassed the Oder, and encamped at Retvin. Thence he moved to Furstenvalde, and placed himfelf in fuch a manner, that the Ruffians did not venture to make any attempt upon Berlin. He continually watched their army; a part of which, inflead of turning towards Brandenburg, marched into Lufatia, where it joined that of the Auftrians.

Auftrians. Here the victorious Soltikof, for the first time, met marshal Daun, and amidst rejoicings and gratulations, confulted about the measures for improving their fucces.

The Ruffians profited no more by the advantages obtained at Kunnersdorf, than they had done the preceding year by the victory at Yægerfdorf, but remained stationary in that district, and demolifhed, according to cuftom, being ever intent on fpreading ruin and defolation around them, all the fluices of the Frederic-William canal, which connects the Spree with the Oder. Marshal Daun was for passing the Oder: but he was over-ruled; and thus furnished another inftance, that the auftrian and ruffian generals do not readily act in concert *. Soltikof excufed himfelf by alleging, that he had already done much: having in this year alone twice routed the Pruffians, and thereby extremely reduced his numbers, while the great auftrian army had remained totally inactive; and that therefore he ought not to remove far from Poland, for fear of being diftreffed by the want of provisions for his troops. Daun promifed to fend him provisions : a promife which, as the Ruffians kept advancing, he was unable to perform, efpecially fince prince Henry endeavoured everywhere to deftroy the austrian magazines. Daun, who therefore had enough to do to provide for himfelf, now offered the Ruffians money : but Soltikof fent him word that his foldiers could not eat money; and as, moreover, the king was doing his utmost to prevent the junction of the Ruffians with the Austrians, Soltikof retired to winter-quarters in Poland, without performing anything farther. His army alfo on this retreat committed incredible outrages and cruelties, burning villages, the feats of noblemen, and feveral towns in Silefia and Brandenburg, fo that fmoaking ruins now likewife marked the way by which they abandoned the pruffian territory *.

* This diflike to the Auftrians might probably be in part afcribed to the complaints which, in the feven year war, the court of Vienna was perpetually making againft the ruffian generals at that of Peterfburg. This being at length perceived by the former, attempts were made, by flattery and prefents, to repair the union that had been thus diffolved too late.

In the year 1760 the Ruffians marched into eaftern Pomerania, where they invefted Colberg

* They were refolved, it was faid, to leave the pruffian fubjects nothing but air and earth, and were actually making preparations to put their inhuman threats, unjuftifiable even in war, into execution. Frederic on this occafion faid, "We have to do with barbarians who are digging the grave of humanity."

both

both by land and fea, and preffed that city with a close and unremitted fiege; but again without effect. In the meantime another corps, under the orders of count Chernichef entered Berlin ; and the king of Pruffia at laft faw his capital taken by his most cruel enemies, and put to ranfom; his native country was wafted; they took up their quarters in his palaces, ruined all the royal manufactories, emptied the arfenal, and would have carried their wild outrages flill farther against the city and its inhabitants, had not general Tottleben, who had been formerly in the pruffian fervice, and lived fometime in Berlin, acted the part of a mediator between them and their enemies, and exerted himfelf to the utmost to procure them a reprieve. The Ruffians, however, no fooner heard that the king was on his march to the fuccour of his diffreffed capital, than they turned about and withdrew to Poland, after the command had been given to count, Butturlin, in confequence of an opinion that prevailed even at St. Petersburg, and which had been corroborated by accounts from Vienna, that it was the fault of the ruffian commanders, that the combined forces of the two imperial courts had atchieved no more.

Again in the following year [1761], the Ruffians fucceeded in effecting a junction with the the Austrians near Strigau. But the want of provisions separated the two armies; when the Ruffians, having re-croffed the Oder, now made themselves masters of the fortifications of Colberg, which, though badly garrifoned, had been no less than ten times fummoned to furrender in vain, and took up their winter-quarters in Pomerania, and the Neumark. The affairs of the king of Pruffia were certainly at present in a far more calamitous fituation, than they had been at any period during the whole course of the war. The Auftrians had fpread themfelves over all Silefia. while the Mark and Pomerania were fubmitted to the ravages of the Ruffians : nothing remained to him but Saxony. Frederic too felt his diftreffes more heavily than ever; he became fuddenly referved, fpeaking but little, even with his most confidential officers; and feemed now to apprehend that it would be extremely difficult, if not utterly imposible, for him any longer to make head against his enemies. But at the very moment when his condition feemed the most hopelefs, the death of the empress Elizabeth, which happened on the 25th of December 1761, opened to him all at once a brighter profpect, and refcued him from a labyrinth, out of which he could perceive no efcape, and from which it is hard hard to conceive a poffible means of being extricated by any human combination of events. So unfortunately circumftanced were the affairs of the king of Pruffia, that his wifeft fchemes and happieft fucceffes could hardly anfwer any other end, than to vary the fcene of his diftrefs; when exactly in this critical conjuncture, that unexpected removal of his inveterate foe took place; and the very change thus effected in the perfon of the ruffian fovereign, which fuddenly fnatched him from his lamentable condition, at the fame time laid the bafis of that honourable peace, which two years after crowned his toils, and completely annihilated the plans and machinations of his numerous enemies.

Elizabeth, as emprefs, governed but little of herfelf; it being properly her minifters and favourites who dictated her regulations and decrees. Of this number, befides Befluchef, was alfo Razumoffky, to whom, as was faid, the emprefs was even privately married. At the beginning of her reign, it is true, fhe went a few times to the fittings of the fenate; but the matters transfacted there were by much too ferious for her mind; and, accordingly, fhe very foon left off that practice altogether, contenting herfelf by confirming with her fignature the refolutions tions of that affembly, and the determinations of her minifler, or the conference, which fupplied the place of the council.

Her character in general was mild, as was evident from the tears it cost her whenever she received accounts from Pruffia even of victories gained by her own army, on account of the human blood by which they must neceffarily have been purchased. Yet even this delicate fenfibility did not reftrain her from profecuting the war which the had entered into from a fpecies of revenge, and for the purpofe of humbling the king of Pruffia, and even on her death-bed from exhorting the perfons about to the most vigorous continuation of it. It alfo proceeded from this fenfibility, that immediately on her acceffion to the government fhe made the vow never to put her fignature to a fentence of death. A refolution which fhe faithfully kept; though it cannot be averred to have been for the benefit of the empire : fince in confequence of it the number of malefactors who deferved to die was every day increasing, infomuch that even the clergy requefted the emprefs to retract her vow, at the fame time urging proofs that they could releafe her from it. ·All the arguments they could ufe, however, were of no avail to move the confcientious monarch; file fhe would not give effect to any fentence of death *, although the commanders in the army particularly would have been glad that her confcience had yielded a little on that point. They declared that the foldiers were not to be reftrained from their exceffes by the feveres corporal punishments they could employ; whereas fuch was their dread of a folemn execution, that a few examples of that nature would have effectually kept them in awe.

Commerce and literature, arts, manufactures, handicrafts, and the other means of livelihood, which had been foftered by the former fovereigns, continued their courfe under Elizabeth with increasing prosperity. The country-products were obtained and wrought up in greater quantities, and feveral branches of profit were more zealoufly carried on. The fum appointed for the fupport of the academy of fciences founded by Peter I. at St. Petersburg, was con-

* It is true, that, in lieu of capital executions, punifiments were inflicted far more terrible than death, as for example, the tearing out the tongue by the roots. The commandant at Rogervyk had ufually ten thousand malefactors under his care, all of them shockingly mutilated, either by having the tongue torn out, or the fides of the noftils cut away by red-hot piacers, or their ears cut off, or their aims twifted behind them by diflocation at the faculders, &c.

fiderably augmented by Elizabeth, and the moreover eftablished in 1758 the academy still subsisting for the arts of painting and sculpture, in which a number of young perfons are brought up as painters, engravers, statuaries, architects, and the like. At Mosco she endowed an univerfity and two gymnasiums.

The empress Elizabeth herfelf having a good voice, mufic, which Anne had already much encouraged, found under her administration a perpetual acceffion of disciples and admirers; fo that even numbers of perfons of diffinction at St. Peterfburg became excellent performers. The art of acting plays was now alfo more general among the Ruffians. Formerly none but french or italian pieces were performed on the flage of St. Petersburg, whereas now Sumarokof obtained celebrity as a dramatic poet in his native language, and in 1756 Elizabeth laid the foundation of a ruffian theatre in her refidence. - Architecture, likewife, found a great admirer and patronels in her, Peterfburg and its vicinity being indebted to her for great embellishments and numerous structures.

The magnificence which had prevailed under Anne at the court of St. Petersburg was not diminished during her reign, and the court esta-. blishment blifhment therefore amounted to extraordinary fums. Elizabeth, indeed, in this refpect did not imitate her great father; and accordingly in the feven-year war the want of a well-flored treafury was already very fenfibly felt.

The population of the empire was confiderably increafed under her; and fo early as 1752, according to the flatement in an account publifhed by an official perfon it was augmented by one fifth.

Elizabeth continued the practice of her predeceffors in encouraging foreigners to come and fettle in her empire. Emigrant Servians cultivated a confiderable tract of land, till then almost entirely uninhabited, on the borders of Turkey, where they built the town of Elizabethgorod, and multiplied fo fast, that more recently [1764] a particular district was formed of these improvements, under the name of New Servia. Only the jews Elizabeth was no less resolute not to tolerate than her father had been; infomuch that fo early in her reign as 1743 they were ordered to quit the country on pain of death.

The army was augmented under Elizabeth; improved, however, certainly not. There were now no longer at the head of it fuch men as the foreigners foreigners Munich, Keith, or Lœvendal *; who, befides their perfonal courage and intrepidity, poffeffed the foundest principles of the art of war; and, what is of no lefs confequence in a . commander, kept up a strict discipline, and took care that the laws of fubordination were punctually obferved. The exceffive licence which the regiments of guards, particularly the lifecompany of the preobajenskoy guards, prefumed to exercife, under the very eyes of the empress in St. Peterfburg, afforded no good example to the reft of the army; and Elizabeth, in appointing those foldiers of that life-company, who had been most guilty of flagrant diforders and the bafest conduct, to be officers in the marching regiments, gives us no very high idea of what was required in an officer, but rather ferves eafily to explain whence it arofe that fuch frequent complaints were made of infubordination. - A great number of excellent regulations that had been introduced into the army, and * Munich was in Siberia; Keith was gone into the pruffian, and Lœvendal into the french fervice. The emprefs greatly regretted the lofs of the two latter; and unqueftionably they were the beft generals of her army, but they were often obliged to put up with affronts from the native Ruffians under Elizabeth, and had no friend in Beftuchef.

always enforced by foreigners, especially by Munich, were fuffered by the ruffian generals to fall into total difuse; the bad effects of which negligence were very foon perceived : and it was undoubtedly a circumftance highly favourable to the ruffian troops, that for feveral years fucceffively in the war which we have had occafion fo often to mention, they had to engage with fuch a master in the military art as the king of Pruffia, and by their conflicts with him, as well as by their connection with the auftrian, and in the fequel with the pruffian foldiery, they had an opportunity for learning fo many things and of forming themselves into regular combatants *. As foldiers, the Ruffians, even in the feven-year war, difplayed great perfonal bravery, generally opposing the enemy with the utmost obstinacy. " Thefe fellows may be killed, it is true," Frederic once obferved, " but they can never * Thus, for example, in an engagement with the Pruffians, they drew up in the fame order of battle as they obferved in their wars with the Turks and Tartars, forming the whole army into a quadrangle, in the centre of which was the baggage. But the cannon balls made dreadful havoc with troops fo clofely compreffed; one fingle fhot is faid to have either killed or wounded 42 men of a regiment of grenadiers. — In fighting againft Tartars, who have in part no other arms than arrows, this order of battle may perhaps be advantageous.

" be conquered ;" for they flood like ramparts, defended themfelves valiantly at their pofts, and frequently would fuffer themfelves to be cut in pieces rather than fall back an inch. But when once they were thrown into diforder, it was out of the power of any officer to bring them to rally and stand their ground; they then began to fall upon the brandy cafks among the baggage, with which they made themfelves fo beaftly drunk that they fired and cut at their officers who were endeavouring to reftore order among them, or they difperfed themfelves over the fcene of action to ranfack. the villages and rob the inhabitants, where they often met death as a reward for their imprudence. Thus it was usual for them, by their behaviour in the field of battle, in the camp, and in their quarters, to give a striking example of what a difciplined army ought not to be. The art of engaging with heavy artillery was moreover that particular branch of military fcience, wherein the Ruffians had always been moft expert, and the fire of their cannon ftruck terror into the enemy. One of their generals, count Shuvalof, had, fhortly before the feven-year war broke out, invented a new kind of howitzer which produced the greatest effect, and in the feveral engagements with the Pruffians, was employed VOL. employed greatly to the difadvantage of the latter.

Elizabeth tarnished her reign * by the institution of a political court of inquifition, under the name of a fecret flate-chancery, empowered to examine into and punish all fuch charges brought before it as related to the expression of any kind of difpleafure with the meafures of government. This, as is usual in all fuch cafes, opened a door to the vileft practices : the loweft and molt profligate of mankind were now employed as fpies and informers, who were paid for their denunciations and calumnies, for bearing witnefs against the most virtuous characters, if they happened by a look, by a fhrug of the shoulders, by a few harmless words, to fignify their difapprobation of the proceedings of the fovereign, as was frequently the cafe, efpecially on the part which Elizabeth took in the war against Frederic II. Sons might impeach their fathers, debtors their creditors, and thus the prifons were frequently infufficient to contain the number of those who were accused of a want of refpect for the government, and of fome feditious speech, as every flight stricture was immediately called. - Elizabeth evinced, especially in the latter years of her life, great apprehensions and alarms, as if afraid that fhe fhould meet a fimilar fate with that fhe had brought upon Anne; and is faid therefore to have more than once curfed the memory of those who first conceived the thought of chacing princes from their. thrones. - She is univerfally reported to have indulged, but more particularly for fome years before her death, in the most unbounded intemperance and fenfuality: however, fhe continued in the undifturbed and tranquil enjoyment of her exalted station to the last day of her life. At that period Charles Peter Ulric, or, as he is styled in his quality of emperor, Peter III. peaceably and legitimately acceded to the ruffian. crown as her declared fucceffor.

* The barbarities of the ruffian troops in the territories of the king of Pruffia were committed indeed during her reign; but in this refpect fhe may perhaps be thought in fome degree excufable, as thefe horrors were perpetrated without her knowledge. It was at leaft not her will that her troops fhould behave in fuch a manner. She had given proper orders for a more honourable treatment of the inhabitants of the hoftile countries — only thefe orders met with the fame fate that many thoufands, both before and funce, have had, that of not being obeyed.

PETER III. was the only fon of Charles Frederic duke of Holftein, by the princefs Anne, eldeft daughter of Peter the Great and Catharine I. He was born at Kiel, in 1728; his parents having thought it prudent to quit Ruffia on the death of Catharine I, their affectionate mother. Soon after Peter's birth his mother Anne departed this life. - His father on the demife of Charles XII. had every reafonable expectation of being king of Sweden. Had the life of Charles been protracted, and, as from his little propenfity to the female fex there was room to expect, had not married, then probably the duke would have been his fucceffor; but that monarch being fuddenly killed by a fhot before Frederikshall, the views of Charles Frederic on the fwedish throne immediately vanished, though, as the fon of Charles's elder fifter, he had the nearest right. Ulrica, younger fister of Charles, took the crown of Sweden, and the difappointed duke repaired to Ruffia. Peter I. would gladly have helped him in the recovery of his right; but his exertions were fruitlefs; and that fovereign was even obliged, at the treaty of Nystadt, to promise not to meddle either directly or indirectly in the fucceffion of Sweden.' The duke was however hufband of the princels Anne, and had fome hope to fee, on the death of Catharine I. his wife, perhaps, Catharine's eldest daughter, empress of Russia: but this hope alfo was defeated. Mentfhikof, in order to keep up his confequence in the administration, had fo contrived that the young Peter Peter was named as fucceffor in Catharine's will, to whom, only in cafe he fhould die childlefs, Anne was to fucceed; and, that this cafe might not eafily happen, Mentshikof refolved to marry Peter early. Nevertheless, as Peter actually died unmarried and without heirs, Anne might certainly have appealed to Catharine's teftament in fupport of her claims to the vacant throne. But fhe was now no longer alive, and her husband the duke, who lived in perfect retire. ment, feeing the pretentions allo of his fon Peter now totally frustrated by the election of Anne dowager duchefs of Courland, brought him up in a manner befitting a prince of the petty domains of Holftein-Gottorp, as fortune feemed to have cut him off from all hopes of acquiring a grander throne. Peter's education, therefore, at Kiel, first under the care of his father, and then under that of his uncle, duke Adolphus Frederic, bilhop of Lubeck*, was fuch as promifed to qualify him for an able and worthy ruler of his little patrimony; when all at once in his fourteenth year, the most brilliant profpect, that of being one day monarch of the vast russian empire, opened upon him. Elizabeth, the maternal aunt of Peter, fent for the young prince to St. Peteríburg; and, on his arrival there, after he had publicly made profeffion of the greek communion, proclaimed him grand-duke of Ruffia, and her fucceffor to the imperial diadem. The fame year, likewife, the Swedes had elected him their king: an honour which he declined to accept; and remained in Ruffia. Thus therefore the fon prefumed to reject that crown for which the father had contended in vain; and in lieu thereof obtained the reverfion of a ftill mightier realm, which the father had fuppofed to be loft to him for ever.

Elizabeth then acted fo far entirely as became a relation to her nephew; and fhe really had a cordial affection for the young prince. But certainly much more was incumbent on her than fimply the calling of him to Ruffia, if the intended to form him for a fovereign, capable of being one day a bleffing to himfelf and to his people as her immediate fucceffor. Here, however, fhe was unpardonably negligent. Inflead of giving Peter an opportunity for fludying the train of flate bufinefs in fo extensive a monarchy as that of Ruffia, fhe kept him at a diftance from whatever related to the affairs of government. Diftruft and jealoufy which evilminded perfons endeavoured to excite and to foment foment very foon begot a coolnefs between the aunt and the nephew; and Elizabeth more and more narrowed the fphere of Peter's activity, inftead of guiding it, as fhe ought to have done, to objects worthy of a future fovereign. She even fuffered him frequently to be in great want of money. No employment was therefore left for Peter, except the military. He was diligent in exercifing the guards; but occupied himfelf principally with a fmall body of holftein troops that were quartered in Oranienbaum, and to whom he was more attached, as his countrymen, than to the Ruffians, and they in return . fhewed greater fidelity and devotion to him.

HISTORY OF RUSSIA.

This reciprocal want of confidence between Elizabeth and Peter continued with increasing effects, but more particularly in the first years of the war of 1756. Peter, who had been perfonally acquainted with the king of Pruffia, entertained an unbounded reverence for that monarch : he could imagine nothing more valuable than his friendship; of which Frederic alfo gave many teftimonies to Peter, and the grand-duke fuffered no opportunity to pafs, in which he could evince his veneration for his royal friend. These fentiments, so entirely opposite to those of Elizabeth, neceffarily engendered parties in the court; and it could not be agreeable to the emprefs  $\mathbb{Z}$  4 empress, who wished from her heart to render all her fubjects the implacable enemies of the Pruffians, that even her fucceffor fhould fet the example of difapproving her proceedings against Frederic. When the ruffian army gained a victory over the Pruffians, and a thankfgiving was kept for it in Russia, Peter never appeared at the folemnity; but endeavoured, by publishing more authentic accounts of the loss fustained by the Ruffians, to abate the joy of the fubjects: on the other hand, when the king of Pruffia defeated the Ruffians, he celebrated the day in feftivity with his foldiers and companions at Oranienbaum. This striking partiality of the grand-duke for the pruffian hero may very eafily be fuppofed to have raifed apprehenfions in the mind of Elizabeth left Peter should, perhaps, by putting all to the ftake, as the had done before, get possession of the throne; to which fhe was inclined to fuspect that Frederic might furnish him with the best advice. But Peter was not a man to bring fuch a defign to bear, if the plan of it had been fuggested to him: he had neither courage nor refolution enough for it, as was afterwards feen at his detrution from the throne. Thus much, however, may fafely be affirmed, that Elizabeth's diffolution caufed him no extreme regret, though certainly not fo much much becaufe he was delivered by it from his very confined fituation, as becaufe he now obtained the opportunity of giving the king of Pruffia a more explicit and unequivocal proof of his friendfhip and effeem, by putting an end to the war carried on againft him, than he had been hitherto able, by the important fervices he had rendered him during the war, and in endeavouring in various ways, and as far as poffible, to alleviate the preffure of it.

He fent to inform Frederic of his acceffion to the throne; and the king, not content with barely felicitating him on the event, communicated to him his earnest defire to enter on a negotiation for peace with him. Though Peter inherited the crown from Elizabeth, he did not inherit with it her animofity against Pruffia, and therefore immediately fettled an armiftice with Frederic : he next addreffed himfelf to the allies of his empire to bring about a general peace with Pruffia; and, on their refufing to hearken to his propofals*, he prefently after concluded a feparate peace between the courts of St. Petersburg and Berlin, by the terms whereof Frederic had reflitution of all that the ruffian troops had captured in his dominions.

* For the answers given by the feveral courts and other ftate papers during this reign, fee Life of Catharine II. yol. i. Appendix.

Though

Though this was already much more than the pruffian monarch could have expected, yet Peter ftopped not here, but directly proceeded even to declare himfelf the friend and ally of the king of Pruffia, and at the fame time fent orders to his troops to join the Pruffians, where they were to act under the immediate orders of the king. Thus the two powers, from the most inveterate enemies, were now not only friends but even allies. A change which indeed excited univerfal aftonifhment, and at first feemed incredible even to the contending armies, though it prefently impreffed itfelf on them as an undeniable fact. Frederic, however, did not make use of the Ruffians at this time: they once afforded him fignal fervice, though not till after Peter's death, and then not fo much by participation as by their inactivity, as may be feen from the hiftory of his fucceffor.

By this peace the emperor did not acquire many thanks from his country, as they conceived he had acted too generoufly, and given away too much. The rejoicings were infinitely greater on account of the abolition of the fecret ftate-chancery, and the recall of all those who had been banished under the former * administrations as the victims of policy, or of the felfish passions of the rulers, and the intrigues of their ministers.

The activity of Peter's mind feemed now to expand with his elevation ; and the ftate of inaction in which Elizabeth had kept her nephew, was fucceeded by a vigilance and energy highly honourable to the monarch. He enacted feveral new flatutes, and made many falutary regulations. Thus, in alleviation of the burdens of the people, he lowered the price of falt; gave the ruffian nobility, whom he confidered as still in want of fome farther polish, permission to enter into foreign fervice to improve themfelves in military exercifes, and to vifit foreign courts to correct and enlarge their notions; for the encouragement of commerce he leffened the duties in the livonian ports, and inftituted a loan-bank to abate the preffure of exceffive ufury. He diligently vifited the feveral official departments of government, was industrious in his application to state affairs, received petitions with his own hand - by all which he excited the general hope that the empire would be profperous during his reign. Yet, notwithstanding his activity, through which a certain hearty goodwill to be ufeful to his country was manifeftly apparent, he shewed, by his behaviour towards his wife, who greatly excelled him in intellectual endowments, by his prominent partiality for the the Germans, by the hafty regulations he introduced among the troops, particularly the guards, by his attempts to reform the church and the clergy, by his perfect indifference for popular opinions and prejudices, by his inveterate hatred to Denmark, and by the war he projected for the pacification of it, that he had not the art of calculating the confequences of his actions as a fovereign, and of combining with his activity the neceffary qualities of wildom and prudence. It was this want of prudence, which appeared on fo many occa- . fions, though it was doubly neceffary to him as a german prince on the ruffian throne, that involved him in his fublequent misfortunes, and finally brought on his ruin; fo that he was dethroned without the leaft opposition.

Elizabeth had taken care early to provide a fit match for her nephew the grand-duke Peter. Her first choice, as she was then in peace and amity with Frederic, was directed to the princes Amelia of Prussia, fister to the king, as a confort for her fuccessor. Frederic, however, declined this honour; and, in return for the confidence reposed in him, took the liberty to fuggest, that the princes Augusta Sophia Frederica, of Anhalt-Zerbst, a relation of the grand-duke would be a fuitable match : the connection was accordingly brought about, Lestocq having a principal principal share in the negotiation. This princes, therefore, came to Russia in 1744, was baptized into the greek church, receiving at the ceremony the name of Ekatarina Alexievna, and was married to Peter on the first of September 1745. The new-married couple agreed together very well at first; but this marriage certainly was not crowned with that complete and permanent union, which is founded on a fimilarity of fentiment and character. Peter was rather unpleafing and coarfe in his manners; and had fallen into habits of intemperance: as these were highly difagreeable to Catharine, it was no difficult matter for the court-cabal to weaken still more the little affection that fubfilted between them, till at last a mutual coldness and aversion enfued. Peter had ceafed to fhew any indulgence, efpecially fince he became emperor, and indeed to observe any decorum towards his spouse; affronted and infulted her both in public * and in private, thereby continually more and more alienating her from him, and even talked openly of repudiating her, and of difinheriting her fon. His enemies, of whom he had a great many at court, failed not to represent his behaviour to the emprefs in the most odious light, to fan her diflike to him, to infpire her with a dread of him, and by these means to prepare her for adopting those measures, which they represented to her as the only ones left to procure a deliverance.

Peter was a German, and was fo little acquainted with the art of concealing his predilection for his countrymen, fo plainly manifelted on all occasions his contempt for the Ruffians, that it was utterly impoffible for him ever to gain the attachment and affection of the nation he governed. By his general conduct, and particularly by his inordinate admiration of whatever was pruffian, he injured himfelf most with the troops, and especially with the guards. The ruffian army had in the laft year feveral times defeated the Pruffians : and though these victories were always more to be afcribed to the fuperiority in numbers of the ruffian forces, than to their greater dexterity in the art of war, yet it was obvious to every man, that the Ruffians, confidering themfelves as conquerors of the Pruffians, would naturally boaft of being better foldiers than the Pruffians. But Peter, notwithftanding, conducted himfelf as the disciple, as a general of the king of Pruffia, paraded frequently in the pruffian uniform, having already, while grand-grand-duke, exercifed his holftein troops in the pruffian methods, and refolved now, on being emperor, to form the whole ruffian army on the model of the pruffian, made a beginning with the guards, gave his uncle, prince Lewis of Holftein, the chief command of them, intending through him and his holftein officers to effect a thorough reform in the military. The regiments of guards, finding their pride hurt by these proceedings, murmured not a little. In addition to this, Peter difbanded the life-company of the preobragenskoi guards, who had been fo highly fayoured by Elizabeth, that his holftein foldiers might do the duty of a life-guard about his perfon; ordered out the guards, (who were always kept in Petersburg, as the garrifon of the refidence, and for guarding the imperial palace,) to take the field against the Danes. Was it then a matter of furprife, that the guards were not favourable to Peter III. and that they did not stand by him at the revolution that followed ?

The clergy likewife took umbrage at the conduct of Peter, and became his enemies, pretending to difcern, from the whole of his behaviour, that he was not a true greek chriftian. He had been brought up in the protestant communion; and, though in his fifteenth year he had conformed to the orthodox greek church, yet the change had been not fo much from conviction, as for form, and from the necessity of the cafe; for that, notwithstanding he might have made him: felf master of the observances and rites of the greek church, yet in his heart he had probably retained his attachment to protestantism; and was too little acquainted with the arts of hypocrify, to conceal his principles. But, alas, he wanted to bring about a reformation, expressed a defire to limit the worfhip, and leffen the number of the figures of faints, and required that the revenues of the facred order, particularly the church-lands, fhould be better managed. But how dangerous a thing it is for a ruler to fet about the extirpation of religious prejudices, and to give new limits or regulations to the authority' of the national clergy, all hiftory fhews. Peter the great, who made reforms in almost every department, was obliged in this to give up feveral plans which he had adopted; and it was referved for Peter III. to feel the fatal effects of haftily proceeding to fuch alterations. The archbishop of Novgorod refisted him openly; Peter deprived him of his dignity : but, this raifing a clamour among the people, he, for the fake of preferving peace, reftored the prelate, and thus at once injured his own caufe, fhewed the

the clergy the extent of their influence, and drew upon himfelf the hatred of that body, and with it the appellation of heretic : an opprobrious epithet, which has never failed to deprive every prince who bore it of the love of his fubjects, by rendering them infenfible to his other merits, were they ever fo great.

As Peter feemed but little inclined to accommodate himfelf to the fentiments of the nation in ecclefiastical affairs, which are apt to be confounded with religion, he shewed no less contempt for the public opinion in other respects, particularly in regard to his coronation. He delayed this ceremony from time to time, though, in the eyes of the people it was not till the coronation had been performed that he was the legitimate ruler of the empire. Even Frederic, his royal friend, advifed him to be crowned as foon as possible: but Peter was deaf to all, remonstrances, confidering it only as an indifferent ceremony; though, as being neceffary and important in the judgment of the nation, it would have greatly added to his confequence and dignity.

Another circumstance, by which Peter incurred the displeasure of his people, was his projected campaign against the Danes. He resolved to enforce the claims of his family to the terrivol. II. A A tory tory of Schlefvig which Denmark had entirely appropriated, as Catharine I. had formerly refolved to do in favour of his father. But certainly this was a rafh undertaking, unneceffarily involving Ruffia in a new and expensive war; and feeming to be not fo much the concern of the emperor of Ruffia, as of the duke of Holstein, rather as a private controverfy than a state affair. Frederic diffuaded him much from this war and offered his mediation : but Peter was immovable. " I will get possession of " the heritage of my fathers," faid he; " it is " of more value to me than the half of the " ruffian empire." This declaration, however, was not calculated to fatisfy the Ruffians, who had already shewn their discontents in various ways *. They were angry that Peter had given up the conquefts made by their troops in Pruffia, without the flighteft compenfation, and for wanting to rufh into a new war; that he had voluntarily furrendered what he had acquired there, and wifhed to put it to the fickle chance of war whether he fhould make any new acquifitions. It was no difficult matter for the party in oppofition to Peter to take advantage of these hostilities, for which preparations were already begun, for representing him as always ready to facrifice the country's welfare, the blood and property of his fubjects, and the treasfure of the empire, to his flubborn will and felfish refentments.

At the head of those who now united in a confpiracy to dethrone Peter III. were the brothers count Orlofs, count Razumofiky hetman of the kozaks, count Panin chief tutor of the heir apparent, and the princess Dashkof.<sup>4</sup> It afterwards appeared that the empress was likewife privy to the plot. This confpiracy was as little concealed from Peter, as formerly Elizabeth's enterprise had been from Anne; and Peter shewed the fame unaccountable careless as Anne had displayed. Both the english and pruffian ministers warned him frequently of it, and Frederic gave him feveral hints in his letters; but he flighted every caution of this nature, as if perfectly fatisfied that he was in no danger. It is true that fome of the perfons who were about him, particularly Razumoffky, contributed much to his carelefnefs at firft, in regard to the plot, and to the irrefolution he afterwards fhewed when it was put into execution, by pretending to be his friends, while they kept up an intelligence with the oppofite party, and therefore diffuaded him from embracing proper precautions.

It is probable that the foundation of the scheme for removing him from the government was already laid while Elizabeth was yet living; and, not being able to fucceed in preventing him from the. acceffion on the demife of that princefs, it was determined now to dethrone him. It was at first fettled to take the time when Peter should fet out with the army, which he had caufed to be raifed in Pomerania in order to employ them against the Danes, to have declared him to have forfeited the crown by his abfence. This plan, however, was attended with great difficulties, as Peter might then gain over the troops, return at the head of them, and take his throne by conquest. The party, therefore, deemed it better not to let him depart at all; and, accordingly, the 9th of July 1762, was the day on which they fuddenly and fuccefsfully put their defign in execution.

execution. Peter was at his favourite feat, the imperial country-palace of Oranienbaum, the empress being at another, that of Peterhof. From this place Catharine repaired early in the morning, attended by count Gregory Gregorievitch Orlof, who commanded the ifmailoffky regiment of guards, to Petersburg, and prefented herfelf as empress, not only to that regiment, the generality of whom had been already gained over, but alfo to the other regiments; and, after making a few fcruples, was acknowledged as fuch: an acknowledgment which was foon followed by the greater part of the nobility of St. Petersburg, and the public in general. Peter's uncle, prince Lewis, was preparing to adopt hostile measures, but he was prefently put out of condition to effect anything. About ten o'clock in the forenoon, Catharine took the oath as empress *, in the church of our lady of Kazan, fwearing to defend the liberties and the religion of the Ruffians; on which the nobility, the foldiery, and the populace, did homage, by taking the oath of fealty to the new

Notwithstanding the care that had been taken left Peter fhould have too early information at Oranienbaum of what was paffing in St. Peterfburg, an officer attached to him found means to let him know betimes, that an infurrection threatened to break out in the refidence against him. Peter - still incredulous - instead of thanking the faithful officer for his kind intelligence, ordered him to be arrested, remained in perfect composure, fuffering the first precious moments, in which, perhaps, by adopting vigorous measures, he might have averted the misfortunes that threatened him, to pafs unemployed, calmly giving orders for his carriage to take him to Peterhof, there to celebrate the feast of Peter and Paul t. back, he now first began to open his eyes on the fate that awaited him. Irrefolution, perplexity, plans and projects, formed one moment, -and haftily rejected the next 'as impracticable, now fwayed the minds of Peter and his male and female attendants at Peterhof. His truest friends were unquestionably his holftein troops quartered in Oranienbaum, amounting to about three thousand men, who were all ready to facrifice their lives for him and his prefervation, if he would only head them and march to Peterfburg. Marshal Munich, being then with him, offered to conduct the troops; and from a man of his ftamp much was to be expected. Peter, it is true, adopted one refolution after another, but in a few minutes rejected them all; wavering to and fro in fuch a manner, that the time for execution with any probability of fuccefs was paft; and fo, as he did not accept of the offers of the Holfteiners to fight for him, another propofal to embark with all fpeed, and fail for Pruffia or Sweden, fell to the ground. Without, therefore, having determined on anything, he returned in the morning of the tenth of July, extremely dejected in mind, to his palace at Oranienbaum; while his confort, on the fame morning, accompanied by her partizans and the guards, whole uniform the wore, fet out for Peterhof, AA4

Finding Peter no longer there; and, as he had entirely given up all hopes of escaping with his life, or at least of being able to effectuate anything by force, nothing was left for him but to try what gentle means would do: accordingly, he attempted a negotiation by fending proposals to Catharine; requesting, among other things, that if fhe would allow him to go to Holftein, he would make a full renunciation of the imperial throne. But even this fubmiffion feemed, to those who conducted the revolution, not to promife fufficient fecurity; it was required that Peter fhould come immediately to Petersburg, to receive instructions concerning what was farther expected of him. He came, hoping probably to fee his fpoufe, and to obtain by oral negotiations what could not be granted . him in writing; but - his expectations were too great - here he faw nothing of Catharine: he never faw her again. Count Panin feized him as her prifoner, delivered to him a paper containing the orders of the empress; and Peter fubfcribed the following act of renunciation -with what fort of emotions may eafily be conceived ! "During the fhort fpace of my abfolute " reign over the empire of Ruffia, I became « senfible, Mosco, or more properly Moskva, the metropolis of the russian empire, is one of those flupendous works of time and human industry, which mankind, by whom they were produced, behold at length with astonishment, as doubting whether in reality they are the work of their hands.

From an eminence before the Dorgomubof gate, the eye furveys this coloffal city. The whole face of the horizon feems covered with houfes; and deep beneath, where the fky appears to touch the earth, flill gorgeous palaces and lofty towers project their fummits; prefenting themfelves to the deceived eye as little cottages and thin poles. The perimeter of Mofco amounts to fomewhat above forty verits, or nearly fix geographical miles. Three and fifty main ftreets, fome whereof are feveral verfts in length, and four hundred and eighty-two collateral freets and lanes, interfect this prodigious mass of houses, confisting of more than ten thousand buildings. Twelve fastavas or gates lead into it; and two rivers, the Mofkva and the Yaufa, with the rivulet Neglinnaiva, run through it. The Moskva rifes in the Mofchaifk circle of the government of Molco, and falls into the-Okka near Kolomna. It abounds in fifh, and in the fpring bears confiderable barks that come from the Okka laden with corn. It divides Mofco into two unequal parts, of which the citerior is the largest, the most populous, and, in regard to the number of fine flructures, the principal. Near the foundling-hofpital the YAUSA takes it up, which rifes at Taininfkoï, twelve verfts from Mofco, and near the Kreml the NEGLINNATYA, which takes its fource in Mofco itfelf, on the Samoteka. Three and twenty bridges keep up the communication between the parts of the town divided by thefe rivers.

rivers, whereof the chief are the ftone-bridge over the Moskva, and the court-bridge across the Yausa. Of the antient division of Mosco into five main districts, Kreml, Kitaigorod, Bielgorod, Zemlenoigorod, and the Slobodes, too many vestiges still remain to allow us to pass them by unnoticed, though they are no longer observed.

The KREML, a word of tartarian origin, fignifying the fortrefs, is parted from the Kitaigorod by a rampart and a fosse running in a femicircle round it.

KITAIGOROD is likewife furrounded by ramparts and a ditch, and BIELGOROD too had formerly its walls and fortifications, but they have been long demolifhed. At prefent an allée runs round this quarter of the town, which forms an agreeable promenade for the inhabitants.

ZEMLENOIGOROD is bordered by an earthwall, whence it probably has its name — at prefent, however, only rudera of this wall are remaining. Laftly, the SLOBODES or fuburbs, which inclofe all thefe quarters, are encompaffed by the kammer-college wall, which forms the extreme boundary of Mofco.

According to the police regulation, Mofco is partitioned into twenty chief divifions, denominated from the principal ftreets they feverally comprehend, e. gr, the Bofmanfkoi, the Verfkoi, skoi, &c. Each of these main divisions are again divided into several quartals.

The POPULATION of Mofeo differs greatly according to the feafon of the year. In winter, when the numerous nobility, with their hofts of retainers, flock into the metropolis, the number of the inhabitants amounts to upwards of three hundred thoufand; whereas in fummer, when they are allured back to the country, it does not exceed two hundred thoufand. Accordingly; in the former feafon, all is much more lively and buftling than during the fummer. Trade, amufements, companies, are then infpired with new life, and the ftreets are crouded with carriages, whereas in fummer the rolling of a coach is but rarely heard.

The CLIMATE of Mofco is certainly to be reckoned among the moft falubrious. The fituation is high, and the foil on which it ftands dry, a few morafly parts about the Yaufa and the Neglinnaiya excepted. Add to this that the atmosphere is generally clear and bright, and the weather regular and wholefome. The winter is particularly remarkable for fettled and bright weather. It is abfolutely impossible for an inhabitant of warmer countries to form a conception of a fine winter's day in the northernclimes. The atmosphere is then fo pure that we feel feel the genial virtue of it at every breath. The fky is fo bright that the eye is fcarcely able to bear it; and all the objects around have a fuperior and grander look than ufual. The ftrong impulfe to take exercise in the cold bracing winter air is not to be defcribed, and a better method can hardly be imagined for the confirmation and eftablifhment of health than by fuch a bath in the invigorating æther of the winter.

Befides, the ftreets of Mofco are broad, the fquares are fpacious, and in various parts are extensive gardens; the houses are mostly of only one ftory, and not contiguous, but feparated by infterstices from each other, fo that the air and the fun diffuse their benign influences in every part of them, and noxious vapours can nowhere stagnate. - Advantages in which other large cities are commonly deficient. All this contributes to render the refult of the lifts of births and deaths always favourable to population. Contagious distempers but feldom prevail, and ftill feldomer are they dangerous and ravaging. It is common to fee aged perfons of all ranks, though the rules of falutary diet are fo often trangreffed. It is to be obferved, likewife, that the geographical polition of Molco, in 35° 45' 4" north lat. and 55' 12' 4" east VOL. H. BB long.

On the contrary, the degree of cold which marks the winter here, contributes rather to harden and fortify the body. Hence arifes the ftrong and nervous ftructure of the men who properly compose the Moscovites, whose families have been long fettled in this city, and are particularly met with among the mercantile people of the place.

JUST in the centre of this great city flands the KREML on a confiderable elevation on the bank of

of the river Moskva. The prospect hence on the fide of the river is not to be paralleled. Far beneath flows the Mofkva, the windings whereof may be purfued by the eye to a great diftance. To the right is the ftone-bridge, and to the left that of timber, on which the rattling of carts and carriages of all forts is inceffant. Beyond this bridge the fiream is covered with barks, and from it may be furveyed a great part of the city. Here rife lofty palaces, worthy of adorning either Florence or Rome: there ftand miferable huts that would be a difgrace to many a german village - a contrast which diftinguishes Mosco from all other great cities in Europe. Gothic monafteries, with their gilded turrets on charming elevations, decorate both fides of the river; and the beneficent foundling hospital with its elegant modern buildings, in a lower fpot at the confluence of the Yaufa and the Moskva, contribute not a little to diversify and embellish the grand picture that prefents itfelf to the spectator.

Of a quite different kind are the objects in the foreground, but by no means lefs interesting to the view.

Here stands the ancient palace of the tzars, in which the brave Ivan, the magnanimous Mikhaila Romanof, the wife Alexey Mikhailovitch, BB2 the the gentle Feodor, and the great Peter formerly refided. It is built in the pure gothic ftyle, but has nothing majeftic or impofing in its appearance, as by reafon of its numerous angles and corners only a fmall part of it can be feen at once; what it wants, however, in actual magnificence is amply fupplied by the imagination and the recollection of the great perfonages who have here laboured at the growth and formation of Ruffia. At prefent all here is filent and void : only Time with his ever-working fcythe feems to have made it his abode; and in various parts the marks of his all-deftroying fway were already manifest, when the emperor Paul gave orders to reftore this venerable feat of the ruffian monarchs, and to fit it up as a dwelling place for himfelf and his family.

Some of the apartments of the tzarian palace ferve as a treafury, in which the filver and gold veffels, and other valuables of former times are preferved. Several others are made into armories, containing arms, horfe-caparifons, and accoutrements of days of yore, and of various european and afiatic nations. The afcent to this palace is by the grand flight of fteps eminently called the red or beautiful ftairs, krafnoe kriltzo. In it is the great hall of audience, granovitaiya palata, and the potefinii dvoretz, (reafure (pleafure houfe), which is now the kremlian post-office.

The prefent view of the Kreml is ferene and folemn, to which the multitude of churches and monasteries undoubtedly contribute.

The SOBORES, or cathedrals, are: Ufpenfkoi, to the afcenfion of Mary; Blagoveschtfchenskoi, to the annunciation, with four chapels; Archangelfkoi, to the archangel Michael, with two; Spalfkoi, to the faviour; Stretenfkoi, to the purification: Spafkoi and Nikolfkoi Galtunfkoi: all richly provided with gold and filver church ornaments; and in the third, befides the relics of the tzarevitch Dmitri, who was murdered at Uglitfh, and is worfhipped as a faint, are the tombs of feveral ruffian grandprinces and tzars. The tombs of thefe monarchs are of ftone, covered with red cloth, velvet, or fome coftly fluffs. At the foot of the tomb, in shape like our table monuments, only rounded like a trunk instead of being flat at top, is a filver tablet infcribed with the name of the prince who lies beneath, with the year of his birth and that of his decease.

The curiofities of the cathedral dedicated to the afcenfion of Maria are: the monuments of the patriarchs, the great filver chandelier, and the portrait of the holy virgin, by the hand of the

the artist and evangelist Luke. The chandelier, a prefent from the Venetians to Boris Godunof, weighs 2800 pounds, and is in fact a wonderful piece of workmanship. The portrait bears every appearance of very high antiquity. It hangs at the entrance to the facristy in a filver shrine, and is ornamented with a profusion of precious stones.

This church is in general one of the richeft in the empire in gold and filver decorations, and the facerdotal veftments that are here preferved are of furprifing magnificence.

In this cathedral the ruffian fovereigns are crowned. Several other grand religious ceremonies are likewife here performed: as the footwashing on holy Thursday, when the metropolitan washes the feet of twelve priests of the inferior order. Easter eve is in no church fo folemnly attended as in this; and extraordinary festivals, such as the name-days of the imperial family, the celebration of successful events, victories, &c. are kept with peculiar folemnity in this church.

The other churches of the Kreml are either those belonging to monasteries or of the common order, all less remarkable than the two already mentioned. The whole number amounts to two-and-thirty.

The

The two monasteries of the Kreml are the Tschudof for monks, in the wings of which the spiritual confistory meets, and the Vosnefenskoy nunnery, in which latter are the tombs of several tzarits and tzarevnas. The mother of tzar Mikhaila Feodorovitch here terminated her life.

The fynodal houfe, adjacent to the cathedral, in which formerly the patriarchs dwelt, contains the fynodal library, remarkable for having the greek manufcripts brought from mount Athos.

All these churches and monasteries have a confiderable number of steeples standing near them, with gilt or filver cupolas and crosses. Among these the belfry called the great Ivan, Ivan Veliki, accounted the highest turret in Mosco, is most confpicuous. It was built in the reign of tzar Boris Feodorovitch Godunos, has 22 bells of various sizes, and in a pit lies the largest bell in the world, which was cast by order of the empress Anna; it weighs 12,000 poods, and a piece was broke out of the rim by its fall occasioned by a fire in the year 1737.

Adjacent to the Vofnefenskoy nunnery stands the palace of the Metropolitans, a modern edifice, built in the reign of Catharine.

Two other handfome large ftructures adorn the Kreml. One the fenate-houfe built by Ca-B B 4 tharine

SKETCH OF MOSCO.

tharine II. a grand imperial work, in a noble modern ftyle. Here the fenate and the facred college hold their fittings and keep their archives. A circular hall of this edifice, in which the affemblies of the mofcovian nobility are held, is particularly remarkable for the excellent works in flucco with which it is decorated. All round the hall are ftatues and groups in gypfum, that are certainly to be reckoned among the most exquisite performances of the kind. They are allegorical reprefentations in honour of the late empress, replete with beautiful and lofty fentiments, and executed in a masterly manner. It is only to be lamented that this work is fo fragile, and fo little calculated to bid defiance to the destructive effects of time. The roof of this hall terminates in a cupalo, likewife enriched with flucco decorations, completing the magnificence of the whole.

The other grand building is the arfenal, flanding oppofite to the former — a folid and compact edifice; but fince it was damaged by a fire it remains in an imperfect flate. However a beginning has lately been made towards its refloration.

The Kreml palace was originally built of timber by prince Daniela Alexandrovitch in the year 1300; the grand-prince Dmitri Ivanovitch

vitch Donfki re-conftructed it of ftone in 1367, and Ivan Vaffillievitch, in 1488, employed fome italian architects to enlarge the building, and give it the form in which it now appears. On the fouth fide it is watered by the Mofkva, and on the north by the Neglinnaiya. It is an irregular polygon with fuperb turrets in the gothic ftyle, being furrounded by a deep foffe and lofty ramparts. It has a communication with the town by means of the Nikolfkoi and Spafkoi gates on the eaft fide, the Troitzkoi and Borovitzkoi on the weft, and the Tainatzkoi on the fouth. On the Spafkoi and Troitzkoi gates are chime-clocks which Peter the Great caufed to be made in Holland.

FROM the bank of the Moskva to the Neglinnaiya, the second division of Mosco, called KITAI-

SKETCH OF MOSCO.

KITAIGOROD, runs in a femicircular form round the Kreml. The origin of this appellation is uncertain. The word Kitai ftill fignifies in rufs China; and as the commerce with that country was formerly in a very flourifhing ftate, it is probable that the name Kitaigorod attached to this quarter of the city, as there, among other commodities, chinefe goods were principally fold. Tzar Ivan Vaffillievitch caufed the buildings between the Neglinnaiya and the Moſkva in 1538 to be furrounded with a rampart and an earth wall.

This division is also in an eminent fense usually styled gorod, THE CITY. It is furrounded by a wall and a ditch, with four gates; the Voskresenskoi, the Nikolskoi, the Ilyinskoi, and the Varvarskoi, by which it communicates with the other districts of the town.

Kitaigorod is almost entirely filled with shops or warehouses, and the whole has the appearance of a perpetual fair. In the lower story of the gigantic buildings the numerous shops are huddled together; the upper stories ferving as lodging rooms, eating-houses, taverns, and warehouses. They form the famous mart of Kitaigorod, which is too singular in its kind for not deferving a more accurate description.

The outfide is furrounded by arcades, within which the principal tradefmen have their flops. Beneath

Beneath thefe, that is, under ground, are wine cellars, and here and there are gangways leading to the interior of this ftructure amidst the intricate labyrinth of fmaller fhops of every fpecies. Here streets and rows intersect one another without number, in which foreign commodities as well as inland products and manufactures are exposed to fale. Each class of goods has its peculiar row. Here are the filver-fhops, ferebrennoye-riad; the iron shops, jelesnoye riad; the tin fhops, the leather fhops, the clothes fhops, &c. all that either luxury or neceffity can require is here to be had in abundance. The tradefmen lurk in these darkfome allies eagerly watching fuch as come to buy, and as foon as a paffenger enters them he is inftantly befet by a whole mob of them; fome offering and recommending their goods to him, others forcing him into their fhops with polite addrefs and importunity. In these obscure rows caution and circumfpection are particularly neceffary if you are determined not to be cheated; for in this place artifice and knavery have fixed their darling abode.

Of these large nests of shops there are properly no more than two. Besides these, however, are several prodigious buildings in Kitaigorod — monstrous convolutions of shops, ware-warehoules, dwelling-houfes, and eating-houles, as for example that of Grafnikof, that of Nikity Pavlof, that of Yublef and the exchange, which last is an elegant modern structure, lately rebuilt from the ground, and perfectly corresponds with the magnitude of Mofco, and the opulence of its merchants.

The number of all 'the fliops and warehouses amounts to upwards of 6000.

The other remarkables in the Kitaigorod are the government-buildings, the police-office at the Vofkresenskoi gate, in which the feveral courts of judicature are held; and the Zaikonofpafkoi monaftery in which is the academy for the flavonian, the greek, and latin languages. This inflitution is defined to the education of perfons for the church. The fpecimens delivered annually at public exercises on appointed thefes, and in latin, greek, rufs, and german poetry, which are printed in honour of the name-feast of its founder and patron the metropolite Plato, difplay the fpirit of this eftablifhment and the degree of excellence to which it has attained : yet while we acknowledge that both teachers and fludents ftrive with great application and industry to penetrate into the fanctuary of the fciences, we are obliged to confefs that they have chosen the path which is not exactly exactly the right. The scholastic method of difputation, the practice of making infipid poetical anagrams, epimonies, and acroftics anfwers no end but to cramp the genius, and which have long been rejected in other countries as idle amusements and the productions of a false tafte. This feminary will never properly flourish and prove a bleffing to Ruffia, till it shall strenuously adopt the more liberal and enlightened modes of instruction which fo usefully diffinguishes its younger fifter the univerfity of Mofco. One excellent regulation here, however, is confpicuous for its good effects, and that is the exercife of preaching. A fermon is delivered every Sunday in the church belonging to this monaftery. A practice very much wanted in Ruffia, as it is only at court, or in cathedrals, and then but on very particular occasions that pulpit difcourfes are given. The prefent inflitution owes its origin to the archbishop and metropolitan Plato, who has acquired great merit by his endeavours at the general improvement of the ruffian clergy; though a fchool was erected here in A. M. 7168 by the patriarch Joachim Savelof at the command of tzar Feodor Alexievitch.

Befides these public edifices the Kitaigorod contains a confiderable number of private houses which are mostly inhabited by merchants and artificers, the palace of count Sheremetief excepted.

Here is alfo the cathedral Pokrof, cepted. where the grand ceremony was anciently held of the entrance of the patriarch on palm Sunday *. The other cathedral is dedicated to the mother of God of Kazan. Other buildings are, the printing-office of the holy fynod, where churchbooks are printed, and where a collection of very old ones is kept. From an infeription over the gate it appears that this house was built in 1645. Alfo the house appropriated to the chorifters of the fynod, the cuftom-houfe, the corn magazines, and others. At the krafnaya plofchtfchad, red place, 270 fhops of two stories have been recently built. The whole number of fhops in Kitaigorod is 4021 of brick, and 54 of wood. Oppofite the Spafkoi gate is the place Lobnon, where on occasion of processions public prayers are performed. It has lately been new faced with granite.

The principal fireets of this quarter are the Nikolfkaia, the Ilinkaia, the Varvarka, and Mofkvaretzkaia, fo denominated from St. Nicholas, St. Elias, St. Barbara, and the river Mofkva.

BIELGOROD lies alfo on this fide the river Mofkva, and confifts moftly of brick, and fome of them elegant buildings. This quarter embraces the Kitaigorod in a femicircular form from the influx of the Yaufa into the Mofkva, to the bank of that river again. It was formerly called Tzaref, and probably obtained its prefent appellation Bielgorod or White-town, from the white wall or rampart which was built round it by order of tzar Feodor Ivanovitch in 1586, and at length pulled down on account of its ruinous condition. The vacant place is now furnished with an allee of trees and a canal which takes its rife at a fpring two verfts beyond the parifh of Bolfchoi Muititfchtfch. This walk of birch and linden trees is certainly better calculated for utility as affording an agreeable promenade, which is the more valuable as the majority of the inhabitants of this enormous city live at the diftance of feveral verfts from any means of fo wholefome an exercife.

The moft remarkable public buildings of this diftrict are: the monafteries Vuifokopetroffky, the Kreftovofdvifhenfkoy, the Slatoftenfkoy, and the Stretenfkoy. Nunneries: the Rofteftvenfkoy, Ivanoffkoy, and Alexieffkoy; the Nikitfkoy, and the Yegorieffkoy. Seventy-two churches, and an armenian church built in 1781. The univerfity of Mofco founded in 1755 by the emprefs Elizabeth, with two gymnafiums, one for noble and the other for children of various claffes. Here are taught the ancient and modern languages, mathematics, philofophy, medicine, theoretical and practical jurifprudence, and theology. It has 11 ftated and 5 extraordinary profeffors, 49 tutors, 64 ftudents at the expence of the crown, and 18 at their own, 79 noble fcholars at the crown's expence, and 487 at their own; 71 of various claffes on the foundation, and 373 at their own expence. The late emprefs Catharine II. devoted 125,000 rubles to the enlargement of the buildings.

The other flructures are: the foundlinghoufe; the grammar-school, the post-office, the falt-magazine, the archives, the affignation-bank, the artillery-court, the printing-office of the fenate, the chief apotheke, the mint, &c.

The houfe of the noblemen's club has a magnificent hall able to hold about 2000 perfons. In the galleries and halls of the public theatre mafquerades are frequently given.

A filk-manufactory of 2.4 looms and 65 mafter workmen, and 4 manufactories of playing cards.

Among the private buildings Palchkof's houle, of which more will be faid prefently, is undoubtedly the principal.

The largest and finest streets are: the Pokrofka, the Masnigkaia, the Stretenka, the Petrofska, the Tverskaia, the Nikitskaia, the Mochovaia, and the Pretschistenka.

The BIRD-MARKET, ochotnoi riad, deferves to be briefly mentioned. Here are fold fingingbirds, dogs, rabbits, fquirrels, and all forts of domeftic animals. This trade is by no means inconfiderable, as in no place are there fuch numbers of fanciers of this kind as at Mofco. Nightingales, quails, doves, pigeons, and particularly dogs, are frequently purchafed at incredible prices. Canary-birds are imported in great quantities by the Tyrolefe. The loweft price for a common canary-bird is five rubles; but when they are well taught, it is not unufual for them to coft from 50 to 100 rubles each.

In this quarter are 378 shops, 6 stone-bridges, and one of timber.

ZEMLENOIGOROD and the SLOBODES encircle the three quarters beforementioned, as well on this fide as on that of the river Moskva. Here by the fide of maffy and elegant ftructures are feen wooden houfes, and among them wretched hovels. The origin of the name Zemlenoigorod has been already mentioned. In the years 1591 and 1592, during the reign of tzar Feodor Ivanovitch, it was furrounded by a wall, which was entered by thirty-four gates of timber, and two of ftone; of all these, only the two last are now remaining, the others being either burnt or decayed. Over one of them a tower in the gothic ftyle, called Sukhareva, was erected under Ioann Alexievitch, and Peter Alexievitch, from the year 1692 to 1695, where is now the admiraltyoffice. The principal ftreets in this diffrict are, the Patnitzkaiya, the Kufnetzkaiya, the Yakimanskaiya, the Kosmodemianskaiya, the Ordynka, the Arbatskaiya, the Oftoschenka, the Povarfkaiya, the Ragofhkaiya, and the Taganka.

The SLOBODES or fuburbs, are furrounded by the kammercollege wall, through which the zaftaves or outer-gates are paffages. This wall inclofes incloses likewife a number of waste and empty places, which have probably been left in a view to the future enlargement of Mosco. And in fact the number of houses augments from year to year; fo that feveral of these unoccupied places have within no long period of time been converted into populous ftreets.

The public edifices most deferving of notice in the fuburbs, are the three infirmaries, the Pavlfkoi, the Katarinenskoi, and the great hospital. The last is devoted to fick and infirm foldiers. as the former two are to other patients, of whatever class, nation, or religious profession. The plan of conduct in all of them is exemplary. To the great hospital a chirurgical establishment is annexed, in which a confiderable number of young men are maintained as fludents of medicine at the public expence.

The HOSPITAL OF INVALIDS, an elegant building, with a garden properly attended, in a pleafant fituation, may be matched against any beneficent inftitution of this nature.

The botanic or APOTHECARY-GARDEN, belonging to the imperial apotheke, is kept in an excellent state. This apotheke is appointed to fupply all the inferior apothekes of the lazarets of the empire with drugs and medicines. In the the garden are reared almost all the officinal herbs in great abundance.

The principal and most remarkable suburb is undoubtedly the german flobode; and it is, therefore, by way of eminence, generally called the SLOBODE. It lies on the eaftern fide of the city, and forms the fuburb as one comes hither from Vladimir. It is entered by three of the finest streets, the Pokrofka, the new Bosmannaiya, and the old Bofmannaiya. This fuburb is inhabited not only by Germans, as foreigners might be apt to fuppofe, but likewife many Ruffians live here, either in their own, or hired houses; nor do all the Germans in Mosco refide in the flobode, but a great proportion of them dwell in other freets and parts of the town. Thefe are chiefly phyficians, apothecaries, tutors, merchants, and fome tradefinen, fuch as taylors and shoemakers, who choose their situation according as it fuits with their bufinefs. The german inhabitants of the flobode, belides a few merchants, and fome of the learned professions, are mostly artificers. The Germans have here four churches; two lutheran, one catholic, and one calviniftic. The congregation of the new lutheran church is the most numerous. These churches are fupported by the voluntary contributions butions of the feveral congregations. Each has its preacher with a tolerably good appointment. In connection with each of the two lutheran churches is a fchool, governed by a rector, who at the fame time performs the office of organist and chanter during divine fervice. These fchools would, perhaps, be better conducted, if the pay of the teachers was not fo very fmall.

The new lutheran church is advantageoufly diftinguifhed from the reft by feveral rational and prudent alterations. The introduction of the excellent peterfburg hymn-book, containing the hymns of Klopftock, Gellert, Cramer, &c. and a noble and edifying liturgy, on pure evangelical principles, redounds greatly to the honour of the minifter.

For thefe improvements the church is moftly indebted to its prefent paftor Dr. Jerbzimfky, a man who, among other virtues, poffeffes that of hearkening to reafonable remonstrances and of following the advice of the wife and pious. The dregs of the old leaven have in short been thoroughly purged out by Mr. Heideke, the pastor adjunctus, a young man of uncommon endowments, and eminent erudition. His fermons inculcate a found morality, blended with a clear and convincing doctrine, with which he fuccefsfully combats religious prejudices and unchristian c e 3 conduct; conduct; animating his hearers to a virtuous life by the warmth of his compositions, and the elegance of his delivery. He has all the graces of diction at command, posseffers a rare personal eloquence, a full and modulated utterance, and a dignified ease which never forfakes him. In short, he seems born for an orator.

In the old church the Kœnigfberg hymn-book is ftill retained, and the fermons are more in the tafte of the old fcholaftic theology, fo that those poor fheep of the lutheran flock in Mofco, who yet adhere to the antient formulary of dogmas, may here find their pafture.

The lutheran congregations in Mofco, as well as in Peterfburg, have the privilege of choofing their own preachers; an advantage which the other german congregations in Ruffia have not. They receive their preachers at the appointment of the college of juffice, by whom they are alfo paid; whereas the preachers at Mofco and St. Peterfburg are falaried as well as elected by the congregations.

The generality of the Germans born at Mofco difcover but few traces of their german origin; in manners and cuftoms forming themfelves chiefly on the Ruffians. Numbers of them underftand not a word of German; and many who fpeak it, employ a jargon very difficult to be comprecomprehended; bringing into their fpeech not only applications and properties of the ruffian language, but giving currency to whole words, with or without german terminations : and what is here faid of the Germans may be applied to all foreigners. They fay kriltzo, inftead of the steps at the house-door; gulianie, instead of taking a walk; tfcherdak, for the garret; dvornik, inftead of fervant; rafnofchtfchik, inftead of the man who fells things about the ftreets, &c. " be fo good and tell me;" " do all what I " could ;" " I ordered the taylor to few me a " coat ;" " who fews your clothes ?" inftead of, " who makes your clothes?" and many other fuch inftances verbally translated from the rufs or german.

On the other hand it must be confessed, that the pronunciation of the Germans here, is incomparably foster and more fonorous than that of the native Germans, of whatever province they be. Their tongue becomes more pliant, as in their youth they learn feveral languages, and their ear is better capable of difcriminating whatever is harfh, as they learn almost all the dialects of Germany from the new comers, who meet together in Mosco from the various provinces of that empire; and the provincialism, of language cannot possibly have any charms to an unbiaffed mind.

CC4

The

The German, as well as every other foreigner, comes to Ruffia in the defign of making a fortune, and then quietly to enjoy the fruits of his labours in his native country. For a year or two he adheres firmly to this fentiment, as he finds no attractions to the contrary. Foreign manners and a strange language render his life uncomfortable, and he fighs for home. By infenfible degrees, however, he becomes more familiar with thefe manners and this language. He experiences, on the part of the government, a generous and indulgent treatment, which the more gratefully affects him, the lefs he has been accustomed to it in his own country. While he enjoys almost all the benefits belonging to the natives of the country where he lives, he bears none of their burdens fo long as he choofes to remain a foreigner, and the return to the place of his birth is always open to him, with whatever he has acquired by his industry, his abilities, or his good fortune in Ruffia. Only when he is determined by inclination, or his particular concerns, to declare himfelf a fubject, in order that he may be a burgher, or purchase estates in land, he fhares the burdens of the natives, as well as their fignal advantages. This liberty enjoyed by foreigners in Ruffia is fo inviting and alluring, that it almost always obscures the darling idea of

of home, and feduces many a stranger to be unfaithful to his first love. To this must be added, the luxurious way of life in which men are fo apt to indulge, who make eafy and confiderable profits. Now, if we only confider that the foreigner is under no constraint from forms and ceremonies of any kind, that no vexatious corporation-laws obstruct or confine the artificer in his works, that the phyfician and the artift, after due examination, may exercise their art and skill, and the merchant employ his capital in what way he pleafes, it will be eafily conceived, that very few foreigners, who have lived a long time in Ruffia, have any afpirations to return to their own country; and that those few who have firmnels enough to refift all the charms of their fecond home, and go back to their paternal feat, yet foon make their re-appearance in Ruffia's happy borders, confeffing that it is difficult to accuftom themfelves again to the yoke of partialities, refpectable only from their antiquity, and prejudices hereditarily derived, without examination, from age to age, which formerly appeared lefs hard to be borne, only from habit and the inexperience of early life.

The prime class of the Germans here, undoubtedly, is made up of PHYSICIANS. Over all Russia the medical department is almost exclusively exclusively in the hands of german physicians. But few Russians, and still fewer Englishmen and Frenchmen, form an exception to this observation, and these have in all respects to assimilated with the Germans, that they may be easily mistaken for them. In general, the physician finds a very ample fubfishence in Russia; but his richest veins of gold are Petersburg and Mosco. In London alone, perhaps, is the mine of difeases to productive as here. Several physicians make annually 10,000 rubles by their practice. The most eminent at prefent are, Frese, Yenisch, Keresturi, Doppelmayer, Pfahler, Richter, Maschmeyer, &c.

The reft of the learned Germans in Mofco are fome profeffors of the univerfity, the paftors, and the domeftic tutors, though among the latter fome unlearned occafionally creep in. The falary of the profeffors is not very high; and, in order to gain a decent livelihood, they find it neceffary to have recourfe to collateral occupations, as private tutors, writers, tranflators, &c. After having been ten years in office they get a title, ufually that of hofrath, or courtcounfellor, and regularly every ten years they are promoted in rank.

The domeftic tutors, in the principal and most opulent families, are, fince the french revolution, mostly mostly Germans; yet it is always required of them to posses the french tongue to a certain degree of perfection, as it still continues to be the language of conversation among the superior ranks.

Among the german tradefmen, the taylors are the moft numerous as well as the moft fubftantial. It would be thought a violation of the firft rules of good tafte to wear a coat made by any other than a german taylor; and thefe artificers in drapery are extremely well fkilled in the art of turning this prejudice to their advantage. They bring in long bills, and are well paid for their work. The other german handicraftfimen, fhoe-makers, glovers, joiners, fmiths, &c. all make handfome profits, and are generally likewife in very good circumftances.

Befides the german flobode there is alfo a GRUSINIAN, where the princes, who fled from Grufinia, or Georgia, have fettled with their followers; and a TARTARIAN. They lie on the oppofite fides of the city.

YOUNG as the univerfity is, being founded in the year 1755 by the emprefs Elizabeth, it already evinces many marks of confirmed maturity, and the folidity of the fettled age; and, furprifing as it may feem at fo early a period, fhe rifes from year to year to greater excellence. While the univerfity reckons among its profeffors fuch men as Barfof, Matthæi, Schwartz, Schade, Roft, Tfchubataref, Antonfky, Baufe, Heym, and curators of fuch liberal and enlightened minds as Schuvalof, Meliffino, Kherafkof, and Gallitzin, who have contributed greatly by their talents to bring it to its prefent refpectable flate, no doubts can be entertained of its farther ther progrefs. Of thefe latter KHERASKOF fhines foremost as one of the most diftinguished authors in Russia, in the department of belles lettres. He is at prefent the fenior curator. In the fame rank with him stands prince GAL-LITZIN, a kinsman of the actual founder of the university, the first lord of the bedchamber, Schuvalof. He was educated abroad, chiefly in France. The director TURVENIEF understands feveral foreign languages, and is an active laborious man, who has the prosperity of this feat of learning much at heart.

The univerfity has only three faculties: philofophy, jurifprudence, and medicine; as for the ftudy of theology there are particular feminaries, in Mosco, in the Troitzkoë monastery, in Kolomna, Kief, &c. The number of young men who follow their ftudies at the expence of the crown amounts to fifty: these students, as well as most of the professors, refide in the univerfity, which is a large elegant edifice fituate on the Mochovaiya, occupying, with its collateral buildings, a very confiderable fpace. The students are divided into two classes, one called fimply STUDENTS, the other SWORD-STUDENTS, the fword, with which certain privileges are connected, being distributed as a reward to the more deferving. Nor has there hitherto hitherto been an inftance of this mark of honour having been mifapplied, as frequently happens at the german academies, where every one wears it on being matriculated. The diffribution of the fwords, as well as the gold and filver medals, and the books, which are conferred as recompences for induftry and good conduct, is made at the great half-yearly examinations, when the fludents are obliged to give various proofs of their proficiency; a practice indubitably productive of beneficial effects, and which might be advantageoufly introduced into other univerfities.

The GYMNASIUM, which is connected with the univerfity, ferves it as a feminary; the most advanced of the fuperior claffes being admitted therein as students. The number of scholars at the gymnafium amounts to fome hundreds, of whom 150 are maintained by the crown; the rest have likewife their instruction free of expence. The fons of decayed noblemen, ecclefiaftics, fcribes, ftewards, and petty merchants attend this fchool on account of its cheapnels. But wealthy nobles and rich burghers fend their children to what is called the NOBLE ACA-DEMY: an inftitution originally not within the plan of the univerfity, but which was fet up by a few profeffors as a collateral employment, but is now united with the univerfity. It is in a very flourifhflourishing state, and numbers about 150 pupils. The infpector of this institution is professor Antonsky, in all respects a very diligent and fit perfon for that station.

The FOUNDLING-HOUSE forms an elegant counterpart to the univerfity. This beneficial foundation is continually increasing in ftability and extent: a circumstance partly owing to the wife and well-digested plan on which it is framed, but partly likewife to the rare felicity of having had at its head, almost without exception, prudent and upright governors.

The habitations of the foundlings, their overfeers, teachers, and nurfes, the church, the magazine, breweries, bake-houfes, kitchens, bathing-rooms, hofpital-wards, &c. compofe all together a little town; as the circumference of all thefe buildings comprizes above three verfts. Thefe feveral buildings are fubftantial, commodious, and handfome. Only the diftrict in which they fland, at the confluence of the Yaufa and the Mofkva, is damp and marfhy. The internal-difposition is excellent. The greatest cleanlinefs and order everywhere prevail; due inftruction in everything neceffary for a burgher to know; the utmost attention and care, in regard to the health of the children, are the ftriking characteriftics of this inflitution.

The

The empress takes upon her the chief inspection of the foundling hospital, and under her count Sievers directs the whole; an active and liberal nobleman, known in Europe chiefly by his embaffy in Poland during the diet at Grodno. Under him is a council confifting of the chief director and three wardens. This council expedites everything relative either morally or phyfically to the eftablishment. In fubordination to it are the cenfor, the œconome, and the principal accountant. The cenfor is the chief infpector over the education and inftruction; the br finefs of the æconome and the principal accountant, is fufficiently clear from the names of their office. The funds of this inftitution are a lombard, a tax upon all public entertainments, as plays, Vauxhalls, &c. and upon cards, which are stamped by the foundlinghouse. These two taxes are very productive. The houfe too has feveral manufactories, in which the work is performed moftly by foundlings.

Over the girls is a chief infpectrefs, under whom are the other infpectreffes and nurfes, as the girls and boys are kept carefully feparate. Both the one and the other fex are divided into different ages. Each of thefe ages has its peculiar employments, paftimes, and lections. The inftruction in fciences and languages is con-7 ducted ducted by tutors both with the boys and the girls; but always apart. The latter are taught the feminine arts by women, and every age has an infpectrefs and a nurfe, as the divisions of the boys are provided with their overfeers and nurfes. The whole number of the foundlings is upwards of 5000. At every hour of the day and the night, children are admitted, without the least objection or inquiry. Nothing but a ticket is required, intimating whether or not the child has been baptized; and, if it has, fignifying the name it received. Here are alfo wards properly fitted up for lying-in women, who are delivered by expert midwives free of all expence.

It is not to be defcribed how much this convenient inflitution is frequented. Not only the fruits of forbidden intercourfe are here deposited by high and low, but also numbers of indigent married perfons, fearful that they may not be able to provide food and education for their children, commit them to the care of this' charitable establishment, where they are not only maintained, but brought up to become useful members of fociety. Since the first institution of this hospital, a period of more than forty years, not one instance of child-murder has been detected in the whole circuit of Mosco.

VOL. II.

A SCHOOL

A SCHOOL OF TRADE AND COMMERCE is connected with this eftabliftment, which owes its foundation to the generofity of a wealthy proprietor of iron-mines, the late Prokopy Dimidof. A capital of two hundred and five thoufand rubles was the fund which he prefented to its endowment. In this fchool, a hundred fons of poor merchants are maintained, and taught from their earlieft youth the bufinefs of the counting-houfe, and the languages of Europe. Several mercantile houfes in Mofco-have alreadybeen furnifhed with able clerks from this inftitution.

The foundling house has been principally benefited, fince her majesty the present empres-Maria Feodorevna has beftowed fuch great care and attention in removing the abufes that had crept in, and for the reftoration of order in its. feveral departments. She has particularly exerted her endeavours to put a ftop to the caufes of that exceflive mortality, which indeed was a great reproach to this uleful inflitution. For, though no bills of mortality were ever published. of the foundling-house, which, by the way, was a ftrange neglect, confidering the general regularity that prevails in this place, and the number of phyficians belonging to it, yet it is eafy to conclude, from a variety of circumstances, that the

the mortality in the foundling-houfe must be exceedingly great. The caufes of it, befides the damp and unwholefome fituation of the place, appear to be the following. First, a great part of the new-born children are configned to nurfes in the country till they are weaned. However rational and proper this practice may feem, it is attended with dreadful effects; as the poor children are entirely trufted to negligent, generally hard and infenfible women, and no farther concern is taken about them. Having once received their pay for nurfing, their end is anfwered, whether the child live or not. Perhaps fcarcely a third of the babes given to them ever came back. It is now ordered, that a furgeon fhall go round the villages where the children are kept. In the next place, it feems impoffible, that a wet nurfe should give proper fuck to feveral children at once; and yet it often happened that one wet nurfe had three or four children to nourifh. The emprefs has reformed this abufe likewife. And laftly, the infpectors and phyficians were perhaps in many important respects rather too careless. They feemed to think that they had nothing to do with the poor children, except when they were ill in the fick wards; whereas certainly a concern for the health of the children in fuch an inftitution ought to be inceffant and univerfal.

An Englishman, named Maddox, is the proprietor and manager of the theatre. He came to Moleo about five-and-twenty years ago, as a rope-dancer, pofture-mafter, and performer of fleight of hand. Without money, without knowing the language of the country, unacquainted with the manners and dispositions of the Mofcovites, he ventured to open a theatre; and from his industry, his versatile genius, and perhaps likewife by that fortune, which is faid always to favour the bold, his undertaking was crowned with fucces. He foon obtained fo much credit as to enable him to erect a new theatre from the ground; a structure which for elegance elegance of architecture, as well as for dimenfions and folidity, may vie with any in Mofco. Befides the theatre it contains concert and affembly-rooms, in which the new mafqueraderoom is particularly diftinguistable for its magnificence. This hall, which is of uncommon magnitude, and conveniently holds feveral thoufand perfons, alone cost fifty thousand rubles.

The THEATRE is perhaps one of the largest in Europe. Befides four ftories of boxes, it has two fpacious galleries. The pit has two feries of benches, extending to the main entrance down the middle, having at the fides inclofed feats; and yet there is a confiderable vacant fpace remaining. The boxes are mostly decorated with fumptuous damafk hangings, and furnished with mirrors and pendant lustres. The generality of them have filk curtains, forming altogether a fuperb and brilliant view. They are annually let for a certain number of reprefentations; they are however to be had at a stated price on other days, for particular occafions, at the performance of a new play, or of one that is eminently admired. The annual rent of a box is from three hundred to a thousand rubles and upwards. Admittance to the pit a ruble. - Prices which fufficiently . fhew the expensiveness of the amufements, DD 3 25 as well as the luxury of Molco. For it feldom, happens that a box is unlet; and the pit is generally full.

The actors and actreffes here are not held in that high efteem which they enjoy in Germany, and other countries of Europe by the admirers of their art: on the other hand, however, no prejudice is entertained against them, fo as to exclude them from genteel company, or at leaft to bring them into contempt with certain claffes of fociety, as is still the cafe in fome parts of Germany. The actor, like any other artift, is efteemed by both the quality and the commonalty here, according to his merit; though neither himfelf nor his art is idolized to the difadvantage of other talents. On the contrary, he is generally claffed lower than the poet, the painter, and the elegant fcholar. However, he need nowhere be ashamed of his profession, and it is never made a matter of reproach to him. If he be otherwife a good and peaceable member of fociety, he enjoys all the advantages of it, and ftands as high in the public opinion as any other man. His profession is no obstacle in his way, No popular prejudice keeps him down. In all civil relations he finds credit and confidence if he be otherwife deferving of them. He can quit the theatre, and may expect every fuitable provision provision to which his talents give a right to pretend. I know not which has the best of it, the german actor, who is on one fide extolled to the skies, and on the other funk down to the bottomles pit, or the ruffian performer who quietly makes his way among his friends and countrymen like the rest of mankind.

The performers in Mofco are not fo numerous as they might be. The principal parts are but moderately filled, and fome that are not infignificant lie entirely fallow; for inftance, the parts of the artful parafite. The moft eminent actors are Afchokin, Pomerantzef, Schufcherin, and Ponamaref.

ASCHOKIN, a very good comic performer, is particularly great in the national-comic fcene, and his ufefulnefs is the more confiderable, as he fings. His capital parts are undoubtedly the miller in the MELNIK (the Miller), and the old guardian in the SBITENSCHTSCHIK*. Both pieces are national operettas. The chief part in the former is the MILLER, from whom the piece has its name. Together with his proper

trade he exercifes the art of fortune-telling and of go-between. Nothing can be more natural and true than Afchokin in this part. The guardian in the Sbitenfchtfchik is an old covetous merchant, who refolves to marry his young and rich ward; but fhe, as ufual, is fnatched from his clutches by a poor but young and deferving officer. This character is not unfrequently met with on the theatre of other countries, and in fome is well performed; but here fo much of the national peculiarities is interwoven with it, that it is in fome degree new. Afchokin plays it incomparably.

POMERANTZEF'S parts are generous fathers. He is in the higheft reputation of all the actors, as to his professional talents he adds a profound knowledge of the drama, and an excellent theory of his art. His triumphant part is the Painter in the german play of the Father of the Family. Pity that his organs of utterance are too weak for this large theatre.

SCHUSCHERIN, a well-fhaped man, plays the principal lovers and heroes. Figure, powers of declamation, talents, all concur in rendering him an accomplifhed actor. His favourite part of all is Wilhelm in the Kind der Liebe * by Kotzebue.

* Acted in London under the name of Lovers' Vows.

He

He is rivalled by Plabilfchtfchikof, who plays alfo kings and heroes.

PONAMAREF, a comic actor. His parts are intriguing and diverting fervants, droll tutors, ridiculous pedants, &c. A fly and officious intermeddler in the above-mentioned Sbitenfchtfchik is one of his principal parts. He likewife plays excellently Ghita in the opera Cofa Rara.

Of the actreffes the most diffinguished are madame Sineffky, Naffova, and Kolagridova.

Madame SINEFSKY (now Zakharof) performs the parts of the principal female lover with tolerable fuccefs; but fhe is deficient in voice. In general fhe fhews more feience than talent. Befides, fhe is no longer in her prime. Madame NASSOVA plays the parts of the romp and the fimple country girl; and this department is exactly fuited to her. She is, perhaps, the beft female performer at this theatre; her excellence, however, arifes more from nature than from art. Laftly, madame Kolagridova excels in-Mrs. Siddons's line of parts, and leaves all her fifter performers far behind her, in what relates to art and acquired abilities.

It is not neceffary to particularize the inferior actors. It must not be forgotten, however, that the number of excellent players has lately had an acceffion of two by the engagement of SAN-DUNOF and his wife. Madame SANDUNOVA is peculiarly peculiarly ravifhing in her performance of Chita in the Cofa Rara. She fings to admiration, and is in general a complete actrefs.

Among the pieces reprefented, the originals are but few: most of them being translations from the germans and english, particularly the former. The most favourite, besides the MEL-NIK and the SEITENSCHTSCHIK, which have been already mentioned, are the NEDOROSL *, and the BRIGADIER, both by Van Wisin, and DMITRI SAMOSVANETCH, the False Dmitri, by Kheraskof. This last is a tragedy, of which the plot is taken from the ruffian history. The two pieces by Van Wisin are comedies, and admirably paint the national manners.

The translations that have been attended with most fuccels at this theatre, are Emilia Galotti, Mifs Sarah Samfon, Minna von Barnhelm, Clavigo, Beverley, Mariana, and above all the dramatic productions of Kotzebue: Menschenhas und Reue †, the Papagoy, the Kind der Liebe, Armuth und Edelsinn, i. e. Poverty and Generosity, and Die Lasterschule, or the School of Vice, which are become the favourite pieces of the mofcovite public. These have all had a great run, and are still performed to fuch crowded audiences, that numbers cannot gain admission when a play of Kotzebue's has been announced. No dramatic poet, whether native or foreigner, has here ever attained fuch a height of celebrity as Kotzebue. His name is never mentioned in the politer circles without enthusiafm, and if that be the furest test of excellence, this writer must be a paragon of perfection. At any rate, it may fuffice as a specimen of the taste of this capital in the department of the drama.

The BALLET is deferving of particular notice, as being by no means of an inferior quality. It has gained confiderably under the management of the ballet-mafter PINUCCI, who has had it for fome time. Both the male and female dancers are admirable; the fcenery and decorations are good, and fome by the famous fcene painter Gonzaga, are real master-pieces. Occasionally, however, we are not entirely fatisfied with the wardrobe.

The pit is here, perhaps, in many respects, one of the most polite that can be anywhere feen. The ears are never rent with those noify marks of difapprobation, which do not correct bad actors, and which diftrefs and overpower the inexperienced and timid. The bad or negligent performer performer is here never clapped; which is furely punishment enough for a finner not quite incorrigible. He will doubtless take all poffible pains to improve himfelf, that he may obtain a share in the triumphs of his colleagues, unlefs he be loft to all fense of honour and difgrace; and in that cafe all the hooting and hiffing in the world will never amend him. He is either incapable or fhamelefs, and confequently unfit for the stage. Even the clappings of approbation do not fo frequently distract the attention as in many other theatres, and, which deferves to be noticed, are much oftener directed at the poet than at the performer. A fhrewd remark, a witty repartee, or an affecting fentiment, is fure of being clapped, even though coming from the mouth of a very indifferent performer.

There is one thing for which both boxes and pit are extremely cenfurable; and that is, when the piece is not one of the most admired, fo much talking is heard among the company, that nothing can be understood of what is passing on the gage. On fimilar occasions filence would be c manded in a peremptory tone at an english or a german theatre; but the Moscovites are far too polite for that.

Literature and bookfelling. — Univerfity bookfhops. — Bookfhops in Kitaigorod. — The fenate-printing office.
— That of the fynod. — Ruffian original compositions.
— Kheraſkof's works. — Gollikof's life of Peter the Great. — Karamſin. — Literary periodical publications.
— Political newſpapers. — Schirach's political journaſ.
— Tranflations. — Heym. — Bauſe.

LITERATURE, in general, not being as yet arrived at that degree of estimation, which it has attained in other cultivated nations of Europe, it is no wonder that authorship and bookfelling are in less confideration here than elsewhere. Befides the univerfity-fhop, which is the most confiderable, there are indeed a number of bookstalls in Kitaigorod, but the generality of them contain only fpiritual writings, collections of popular ballads, and fome old romances, which have been long in poffeffion of the public admiration. The privileged printing-offices are three in number, namely, those of the university, of the fenate, and the fynod; of which the first is particularly employed in works of literature, as the fenate-preffes print little elfe than ukafes, and those of the fynod are confined to books of devotion tion and fpiritual edification. Some private printing-offices have been abolifhed by the late ukafe of cenfure, in purfuance whereof only privileged printing-offices are tolerated.

The chief original works in rufs, that have appeared within the laft ten years from the univerfity-prefs, are the following :

KHERASHKOF'S works; containing romances, poems, and plays. They compose feveral volumes, and are juftly much efteemed.

GOLLIKOF's life of Peter the Great; a voluminous work. The former parts of this piece of biography are far fuperior to the latter, which are nothing more than a chaos of records, documents, anecdotes, critiques on other authors who have handled the fame fubject, &c. which fcarcely any one will have the patience to read through. This work, however, is not without its value, as a ftore of archives relating to the reign of that hero, and may hereafter become a good fource to fome biographer of tafte: the author being a wealthy merchant, retired from bufinefs, who has applied his leifure, his abilities, and fortune, folely to this performance. With great pains, and at much expence, he procured a large collection of the tzar's original letters, which, though the major part of them are perfectly infiguificant, he revered as facred relics, and has printed printed in his work with diplomatical exactitude. Almost the whole of what concerns the great monarch is taken from other writers; and, as he is entirely unacquainted with foreign languages, he has procured whole books to be translated for this purpose. In short, the biography of Peter the Great has been the business of his whole life, and there is reason to suppose that supplemental volumes will continue to appear till grim death shall fnatch the pen out of his hand.

The writings of KARAMSIN, a young man who cultivated his talents abroad, make a great noife. His first effays appeared in the Moscovian Journal, a periodical work of which he was the editor. Light poetry is his department, and he has produced feveral pieces in that way, that have met with deferved approbation. Some of his little fentimental flories, as Julia and Eliza, have been translated both into french and german. He feems to have formed himfelf chiefly on the german Anthony Wall, whom he perfectly resembles, both in genius and pursuits. Like him he has written bagatelles, and adapted Marmontel's moral tales to the manners of his country. Of late an almanack of the muses, under the title of Aonides, has been published annually by him, which ferves as a repository for his own little little effusions, and the fanciful flights of a few mofcovite youths of his acquaintance.

There are no fuch things as ruffian JOURNALS and literary periodical publications. The only attempt of this nature that has ever been made; was the Mcfcovian Journal by Karamfin, which was afterwards continued under the name of Aglaia. But its transient duration has shewn, that these excrescencies of superior cultivation will not yet flourish in the climate of Mosco. The political newspapers that appear twice aweek, contain accounts of the new publications, occafionally accompanied with reviews of them by the feveral authors and translators themfelves, or encomiums by the bookfeller. With the newspapers appears a periodical leaf, having for title : " Agreeable and profitable pastime," confifting moftly of translations. The editor of it is professor ZACHATSKY. The political journal of Schirach is alfo translated into rufs.

As to the bufinefs of tranflating, which in Germany is not upon the beft footing, it has not a very inviting appearance here. Karamfin's accommodation of Marmontel's tales excepted, the reft are for the moft part executed by apprentices in the art, without having a competent knowledge of their mother-tongue, and fill lefs of the language from which they tranflate.

translate. Add to this, that they are unacquainted with foreign literature, and confequently make a miferable felection of the performances on which they lavish their time and trouble, while the best works that appear abroad remain untranslated.

Three french bookfhops and one german may ferve to fhew what foreign literature is most in request.

Of the professors of the university HEYM is one of the most industrious as an author. Befides feveral elementary books for the univerfity and the feminary for nobles, he has published a Rufs Grammar for Germans, with proper felections as exercifes. From his pen has likewife come out a Geographical and Topographical Encyclopædia of the ruffian empire; and not long fince two Lexicons have proceeded from the prefs, one german and rufs in two volumes, the other a german-russ-french dictionary, by a fociety of learned men, at the head of whom is Heym. Of this dictionary two volumes have already appeared, containing the german alphabet; probably, when the whole is completed, it may form fix volumes.

Professor BAUSE not long fince published an occasional discourse in latin, wherein he treats of the progress of civilization in Russia, which, on account of feveral new particulars and illustrations, feems even deferving of being known abroad.

A new edition of the poetical works of DER-SCHAVIN has alfo recently gone through the prefs; feveral of which have made their appearance in Germany, translated by Kotzebue. The effusions of this bard are unquestionably to be classed among the most exquisite airs that were ever fung to the lyre.

Mosco has, properly fpeaking, like the whole of northern Ruffia, only two feafons, the sum-MER and the WINTER; fince the fpring and autumn

autumn are of fuch fhort duration, as to form no more than the imperceptible transition of the two chief feafons. We will first view the pleafures of the moscovian fummer, and then proceed to the delights of the winter here, whereof those who live in warmer zones can absolutely form no conception.

The SUMMER of Mofco is, on the whole, not agreeable. The heats of the long days of June and July are opprefive, and the nights are chill. The foot-walker is either fmothered in a cloud of duft, or muft wade through mud and dirt.

The first grand fummer holiday — for the fpring is entirely blotted out — is the first of May. On this day all Mosco repairs to a diftrict of the Falcon-wood, not far from the german flobode, in carriages, on drofchkas *, on horseback, and on foot. The crowd in the ftreets, of people going to this place, is not to be described, and is certainly unique. The most elegant carriages, in three or four rows abreast, roll forward; for on this day luxury difplays all her glories, and new liveries and coaches are usually produced for the first time.

* Light one-horfe carriages, like a fettee without a back, on four wheels, fupplying the place of hackney-coaches.

Between

SKETCH OF MOSCO.

Between the carriages and the front of the houses the light droschkas run along. The officers of police are distributed about the streets to fee that no diforders arife, and that the trains of carriages and drofchkas keep their due diftance. The Red-gate ftands a few verfts from the edge of the Falcon-wood, at which the principal ftreets leading to it converge, and henceforward the coaches are obliged to proceed in one fingle train. From the lines of carriages which meet at this point only a certain number of equipages are therefore let through; and, as thefe come from one line behind another, collifions naturally arife, the repercuffions of which, in fuch a prodigious confluence of carriages, are frequently felt to a confiderable diftance; though, to avoid this as much as possible, the rows often move in a ferpentine direction. This order, which the police fees very rigoroufly obferved, is probably the reafon that, amidft fuch an enormous crowd of coaches, chariots, chaifes, and drofchkas, no accident enfues. Yet it is impoffible to avoid trembling at every moment for the bold horfemen prancing among the narrow fpaces between the carriages, or for the poor pedeftrians twifting and writhing between them and the horfes. No vehicle ever leaves its line, not only for fear of the police-officers, who make the coachmen and and outriders pay for the contumacy by fundry ftrokes with a flick of no fmall fize acrofs their fhoulders, but alfo from prudence, as in that cafe fuch an one must patiently wait till all the carriages are gone by and humbly creep behind the last, as he will not be let through the Redgate alone. It does fometimes happen that an aspiring genius of a coachman will strive to break into the line again; but in that cafe he is almost fure to get a broken head, and perhaps a broken carriage.

Thus, after three hours of fhuddering and palpitation, but alfo amidft a perpetual diverfity of fcenes and profpects, we reach the defired fpot. Here our eyes are immediately prefented with a view of numberlefs booths and tents containing all manner of refrefhments. On one hand, jugglers and rope-dancers are performing their tricks, and on another the ears are faluted with the fongs and vociferous mirth of a drunken crowd from a kabak *, decorated with green twigs and leafy boughs. The whole foreft is alive; motley groups in their beft apparel filling every part. Under every tree a company of jovial people. Equipages and drofchkas and gallant

* The common tippling-houfes in Ruffia are called kabaks.

gallant horfemen parading through the viftas. Great numbers of the coach company get out, and walk in parties through the wood. Others drive in a flow and flately pace to feaft their eyes on the variegated fight. Every mortal is there, to fee and to be feen; till at length the coming-on of night obliges them reluctantly to terminate the delightful holiday and quit the enchanting fcene.

Diversions of this nature are called PROME-NADES*. There are feveral of them during the course of the summer, but not one is so brilliant as the first of May.

This promenade, or rather the fpot where it is held, is likewife called, the German Tables  $\ddagger$ . The origin of this denomination, if we may believe tradition, is this. At the time of Peter the Great, the Germans of the Slobodes had the cuftom to hail the return of the warmer feafon, after fo long a privation of the chearing fun-beams, at this extremity of the Falcon-wood, lying at no great diftance from their homes. They chofe for this purpofe the first of May; and Peter the Great feveral times condescended to take part in this humble festivity. A board pailed on two posts fixed in the ground for tables at various diftances, with others in like manner as benches, were the only accommodations they found; and, at thefe tables every party ate and drank what they brought with them. Hence the vulgar appellation : " The " German Tables." The prefence of the monarch drew the great people to the place; and thus by degrees this promenade came into vogue. The fine feafon (fometimes), and the difplay of wealth and luxury at length brought it to that pitch of fplendour with which it is now continued; and is certainly a curious and peculiar spectacle.

The other promenades to the Maiden-field, to the three mounts, to the donfkoi monastery, &c. are of an inferior kind to that we have been defcribing, and appear to have arifen from religious motives, as they are all on church feftivals, in honour of which these have unquestionably been pilgrimages.

Of the gardens, the most frequented, after those belonging to the palace, are the gardens of count ORLOF. They are in the district of the donskoi monastery, and are laid out in the english style; not indeed completely finished, but forming a very fine plot of ground. Art here has only followed Nature. The bank of the river Moskva makes a charming easy flope, with with alternate gradations of heights and falls, adorned in various parts by a number of very ancient and flately trees. Hence the reader will be enabled to form fome judgment of the fufceptibility of improvement in the grounds; and, on learning that they were laid out by a skilful english gardener, he may get a notion of what they are become. Elegant flructures, as temples, grottos, baths, obelifks, and columns are raifed with tafte in their appropriate places. The beautiful view of the river Moskva and the city add greatly to the charms of this delightful fpot. Here all perfons of fashion affemble, especially on Sundays; and the inferior classes flock for recreation on Sundays and holidays to PASCH-KOF's houfe and gardens.

In a populous quarter of the town, on the bank of the Mochovaia, on a confiderable elevation ftands this enchanting palace. The entrance on the hinder fide in a crofs-ftreet. Paffing through a fuperb portal, you come into a fpacious court, gradually expanding from the gate. On one fide are the ftables, and on the other the riding-houfe; both elegant ftructures. The houfe has two entrances, afcended by grand flights of fteps, which unite at the firft ftory. Thence you may go to the upper apartments, and thence again to the fpacious belvedere in the cupola, cupola, where you have a glorious profpect of all Mofco. The houfe itfelf confifts of a main edifice, and two wings, connected with the body by corridores. This has a projection in the middle, with large bow-windows, and the two principal ways into the garden. This projection forms in the first story a balcony, resting on tuscan columns. High over this balcony are placed the armorial enfigns of Pafchkof, borne on corinthian pillars; which, as well as the whole structure, are models of harmony and proportion. On one fide of the balcony, which is furnished between the columns with the most elegant iron lattice-work imaginable, flands the goddefs Flora, and on the other Ceres. The fupporters to the arms are a couple of reclining figures. The top is vaulted by a cupola, terminating in a belvedere, furrounded by double columns. The wings are ornamented with colonades; and the whole is a pattern of fymmetry and eurythmy. Two other coloffal statues stand in front of the house, on the most elevated fcite of the garden, a Mars and a Minerva, which, together with the other figures, may be ranked among the choicest productions of the chiffel.

On -

On paffing through the houfe we come to the romantic fituation on the forefide of the building to the road. Here, amidst shrubberies, and over rocky fragments, through irregular mazes and ferpentine walks, we defcend the mount on which the houfe is built. Below are two marble balons, from the centre of which fpring fountains; and towards the street an iron lattice of the fineft workmanship incloses the whole. The garden and the ponds fwarm with curious foreign fowls. Chinese geese, various kinds of papagays or parrots, white and variegated peacocks, &c. are here feen either roving about at large, or fuspended to branches of trees in magnificent cages. An innumerable concourse of people affemble here on Sundays and holidays, to enjoy the fine prospect, or furvey the beauties of nature and art which it contains. The gardens, the houfe, the court, the ftables, are full of people; and even the iron-railing to the freet is thronged with the gazing crowd without. Every entrance is perpetually open, not a door is fhut; and fervants stationed in every part, with the most civil officiousness, fly to fetch whatever is required. The owner and builder of this charming fabric is an old podradschik, or contractor, named PASCHKOF, who for feveral years paft paft can only go about in a calafh. The effect produced by this houfe when lighted up, is abfolutely not to be defcribed. This illumination, which is made on all the holidays of the imperial family, is certainly one of the grandest in all Mosco, where they vie with one another on these occasions.

Other places of entertainment, that are likewife much frequented, are, the SPARROW-MOUNT, an elevated fituation on the banks of the Mofkva. The view of the town from this place is excellent, and the country round it extremely beautiful.

The THREE HILLS, a very pleafant place in the neighbourhood of Mosco, obtains its name from three hills in those parts. An old garden, partly overgrown, on the banks of the Moskva, with its shady walks, are chiefly the scene of this promenade. Here springs that excellent water, known by the name of the three-hill-water, and supplies a great part of Mosco, which does not abound in good spring-water.

Stationary amufements for the fummer are but few in this capital. The principal, and almost the only ones, are the Vauxhall and the Beastbaiting.

The VAUXHALL owes its origin, as well as the theatre, to the genius and enterprize of Mr. Maddox.

Maddox. A neat pretty garden at the fouthern extremity of Mosco, is laid out for this purpose. We first enter a set of apartments, that are fitted up as toilette-rooms for the ladies. From thefe a long gallery leads to a grand circular hall for dancing. Adjoining to this hall is a moderate fized theatre, where little pieces, particularly operettas, are performed. From the dancinghall we come into a large area, furrounded by a covered gallery, having in the middle an elevated ftation for the orcheftra. The gallery is chiefly uled for walking to and fro in parties, as at other places of this nature. Beyond this is the hall allotted to refreshments of all kinds. On the fides are billiard-rooms. The other avenues of the garden cannot well be vifited by elegant company. In the evening the galleries are illuminated with coloured lamps, and on particular days a firework is played off. Though the place is extremely pleafant and inviting, it is however but little frequented, partly on account of its diftance, and partly becaufe in fummer few of the nobility are in town. The numerous affembly at the Vauxhall is on Peter and Paul-day.

The BEAST-BAITING is the undertaking of fome people of Vienna and Italians. It is kept in a circular amphitheatre of timber in front of the tverfkoi Saftava, crected by the proprietors for for this purpose. In the ground-floor of this building are the dens of the wild beafts, and the kennels of the bull-dogs. Over these are three tier of boxes for the spectators, and in the open area, which forms the centre, the animals are baited. That diversion, however, does not here meet with fuch approbation as at Vienna, and therefore this edifice is now more frequently uled for the difplay of magnificent fireworks, than for beaft-baiting.

Notwithstanding the large dimensions of Mofco, and though the numerous nobleffe, and the middling ranks of merchants, have a great hankering after diffipations, yet few places of accommodation for that purpole are met with. The scenes of entertainment fo frequent in other cities as coffee-gardens, tea-houses, bowlinggreens, and the like, where perfons may pafs their hours of leifure, according to their various humours, are here either entirely wanting, or are frequented only by the populace. It is the more incomprehenfible how the industry of the natives has miffed of this means of profit, as the entertainments above defcribed are fo little alluring, and are attended with fo many inconveniencies, that it would apparently be a very eafy matter to eradicate the tafte for them. The diftance to the Sparrow-mount, or the three hills, is not great great from feveral quarters of the town; for inftance, not above ten or twelve verfts from the Slobodes, the Bofmann, the Pokrofcoe, and others. At prefent, to prevent fainting at the end of the journey, it is neceffary to take at least liquors of fome kinds, which are rendered unpotable by the heat, and which people would certainly rather pay for on the fpot. At fome diftance from the Slobode there is indeed a german tavern, at which parties from the Slobode frequently befpeak dinners: but it ftands in a barren, uninteresting district on the road to Siberia, and, in regard to its accommodations, is chiefly adapted to the use of the german artificers and tradefmen; and, therefore, is very little frequented by the diftinguished part of the public of Molco.

For want of fuch places of entertainment in the capital, people of all ranks form parties to the imperial country-palaces that lie in the vicinity, and to the country feats of the nobility, whofe gardens and eftablifhments are open to the public enjoyment. This fpecies of amufement is here called, going to the green. Among the former, the pleafure-houfes Petroffkoy, Tzaritzin, and Ifmailova, are the principal.

PETROFSKOY is fituate about three verfts from the Saftava, on the Peterfburg-road. The palace was was built, in the gothic ftyle, by Catharine II. Belonging to it is a pleafant park, which, in favourable weather, is feldom void of walking company.

TZARITZIN' is diftant twelve verfts from Mofco. The buildings are likewife in the gothic tafte, and partly unfinished. The english garden is spacious, and full of delightful situauions. Nature has done uncommonly much for this place. Water, hills, dales, and woods, interchangeably meet the eye in pleasing combinations, affording a scenery beautiful, and highly picturesque. The orangeries are vast rooms, with walks between the trees, which yield the most fragrant odours. In the hot-house great numbers of the ananas are reared.

ISMAILOVA, about eight versts from Mosco, has a large park belonging to it, stocked with deer, roes, wild boars, &c. animals rarely seen in these countries. The park-keeper, a hearty old German, hospitably receives all strangers who come hither to stroll about the green.

Among the country-feats of the nobles, that are vifited by the Moscovites, Kuskova, Astanknia, and Petrofskoy, are the chief.

KUSKOVA is an eftate belonging to count Scheremetof, feven versts from Mosco. Nature has acted like a mother-in-law by this district, and and art has been obliged to do every thing. The buildings, the gardens, and arrangements, are all in a princely ftyle. The manfion and the theatre, the hermitage and the dutch-houfe in the garden, are eminently confpicuous for their elegance and tafte. Entertainments are occafionally given here by the owner, in which the public at large are invited to partake. Dramatical reprefentations, fireworks, illuminations, and dancing, are the alternate amufements at thefe feftivities, and refrefiments of all kinds are handed round to the company.

Entertainments of a fimilar nature are likewife given at ASTANKNIA, which alfo belongs to count Scheremetof, and in magnificence and tafte may vie with Kufkova. It is, indeed, far fuperior to it in regard to fituation, which is 'extremely pleafant and romantic.

PETROFSKOV likewife, a country-feat of count Razumofiky, not far from the imperial Petrofiky, is in a charming fpot. A fpacious and well-kept garden, contiguous to the park, tempts numbers of the inhabitants of Mofco hither. Here, as well as at Kuikova, are vaft orangeries, in which not only the fuperior fruit-trees of every fpecies, but likewife pine apples in great abundance, are reared; and as this fruit is very much cultivated in the forcing-houfes about Mofco, they may commonly commonly be had very cheap in that capital, the fineft ananas cofting not more than a ruble. The head-gardeners both at Kuſkova and Petrofſky are Germans. The orangeries at Kuſkova, even produce a ſuperfluity of rare exotic plants, and twice within the laſt ten years aloes have been in full flower.

On these expeditions into the green, it is cuftomary for the parties to take their kitchen and cellar with them. For, as all thefe places of refort lie at a confiderable distance from town, and we must proceed, perhaps, several versts before we get into the open country, it is ufual to fet out early in the morning. And as abfolutely nothing is to be got at the place for love or money, it is neceffary to carry eatables and drinkables from home. On these occasions the moscovite landladies, who otherwise are not wont to take much notice of their guests, appear in all their fplendour, and numerous parties of this kind of courfe beget a defire to difplay the talents of a good hoftefs before a large company. For mankind are apt to make the greatest boast of those accomplishments and virtues, to which they have the least right to pretend.

The flay of the nobility in the country. — Defeription of a Podmofkovnè. — Manner of living, and amufements in the country. — Theatre. — Hunting. — New mode of hufbandry. — Its introduction into Ruffia. — Progrefs of it. — The quay. — The allée. — The great merit of the police-mafter, Kaverin, in the embellifhment of Mofco. — Noxious and troublefome method of cleanfing the flreets. — The fwings. — Podnabinflty.

Most of the mofcovite nobility pafs the fummer in the country, where in truth they make their flay fo pleafant, that they find no lofs in their abfence from town. A flort defcription of the Podmofkovne* will give fome idea of the pleafures of the country life in Ruffia. As hofpitality is a main feature of the national character of the Ruffians, a vifitor has nothing to apprehend from being tirefome to the landlord. The gentry here never wifh their friends to be gone, but are heartily glad to detain them as long as poffible.

At TSCHASSOVNA, one of these podmoskovnès, the most unconstrained fociability prevails.

* Every country-feat is called a Podmofkovnè, that is fituate within a hundred verfts from Molco: from pod, near, and the name of the capital.

No

No one ftands in the way of another in the employment of his time. The hands and feet are entirely free from any conftraint of diversion or etiquette. The only law imposed by the worthy host on his guests is, that no one shall be a restraint on another.

The eftate lies about thirty verfts from Mofco, not far from the great troïtfkoï road, on the banks of the Skalpa, a river of confiderable magnitude, which here winding its courfe between fhores covered with fhrubs and trees, through a fine romantic landscape, adds much to the beauty of the scene. The mansion of the owner stands on a hill, inclining by a gentle flope to the Skalpa. The architecture of the houfe is of a peculiar tafte. It confifts of a regular quadrangle of two ftories, with a lofty turret in the middle of the roof, which at fome diftance gives it the look of a church. A fpacious balcony runs round the house on all the four fides, affording the most delightful profpects. Exactly oppofite, on an eminence, on the other fide of the Skalpa, is a village with its church, the cottages being difperfed in the most picturefque manner imaginable, on the lofty bank of the river, which, to the right of this village is covered by a thick foreft: the uniformity of the forest being interrupted by various roads, twifting their courfes through it, FF2 and

and rendering the profpect more diversified and lively. On this fide of the river the eye furveys, to a vaft distance, fields and meadows, intersperfed with villages and detached houses. To the left the elevation gradually declines, and loses itself in cultivated plains, intersected by roads, which in almost every feason of the year teem with animation and activity. The interesting scenes of mowing, reaping, ploughing, and fowing, being here represented before the fight in alternate viciflitudes.

On the other fide of the houfe, the profpect is more confined, but not lefs agreeable. The foreground is formed by a pleafant wood of birch trees, and tracts of arable land, through which runs the road to Mofco, planted on each fide with trees. The background is a foreft which opens on the right hand to admit a fpacious lake. The filent foreft, with the quiet lake in which the branches of the overhanging trees are feen to play, forms a real emblem of repofe, and at the fame time a ftriking contraft to the profpect we before furveyed.

At this charming refidence, the practice is, with fuch as choofe it, to rife with the fun, and ramble about the finiling region, either for the fake of enjoying a fine morning, or with the gun flung acrofs the fhoulders, to fhoot fomething for dinner.

At eight o'clock tea is ready in the dinner. balcony of the houfe : and, certainly, that refreshing beverage never taftes fo pleafant as under the azure sky, amid the balmy fragrance of the adjacent woods, the fweet carols of the birds, with a glorious profpect round, and in the open, frank, and friendly converse of liberal and enlightened men. After breakfast the company difperfes, every one his own way. Some go to the library and read, others are for a walk, others order horfes and take a ride, while others again go and vifit the improvements of the landlord in his experiments in the new methods of agriculture, till one o'clock; when all meet again and fit down to the focial and mirthful board. This likewife is prepared in the balcony under the open fky. With the blue vault of heaven for the cieling, and the grand decorations of nature all around, a rural repast tastes full as well as the coftly viands of the town, eaten in a large dininghall, full of exhalations and vapours of every kind.

The difhes being removed, for the cloth remains, the company talk and laugh till the burning heat of the midday fun is over; when away go all on horfeback, or on drofhkas, about the adjacent country, either to fee fome beautiful fpot, or to the theatricals of fome friendly neighbour, or to the hunt.

The theatre of a ruffian nobleman, as well as the chace with dogs, call for a brief defcription, as many of thefe theatres are met with in the country, and this mode of hunting is a favourite diversion of the ruffian nobles, during their refidence in the country.

The actors and actreffes are vaffals; felected, however, in their infancy from a multitude, and brought up to this purpose. They are taught mufic, dancing, declamation, and foreign languages by proper mafters, and now and then become excellent performers. The orcheftra is likewife composed of vaffals, but is commonly under the direction of a foreign leader of a band. It is really furprifing to fee fuch good acting in the country; and the pleafure received at fuch reprefentations is greatly enhanced by this circumftance, that the expectation is ufually deceived by being exceeded. This expensive species of entertainment prefents an idea of the wealth of the ruffian nobles, and the magnificent ftyle in which they live.

The diversion of hunting is not lefs coftly. The nobleman, with his company, on horfeback, followed by upwards of a hundred dogs, with fifteen Effeen or twenty huntfinen on horfes, fome with horns, and others with couteaux de chasse, begins the courfe. He leaps over every hedge, ditch, gate, or whatever elfe is in his way; and those of the company follow him if they can: if not, they ftand gaping after him till they find fome fafer paffage. At length he reaches the foreft, the poor inhabitants whereof are deftined to this day's fport. Here the company divides. The principal perfons take their stations at certain intervals without the wood; keeping with them the greyhounds *; while the huntfinen, with the terriers †, rush into the wood. The horns found, the dogs fet up their barking. The scared and timid animals run out of the foreft, and are purfued by the greyhounds, followed in full cry by the company that were waiting without the wood, over flock and block in a furious gallop, till they have got as many hares and foxes as were unable to effect their escape. In this manner they purfue their noify chace over a tract of twenty or thirty verfts, and in the evening return home in triumph with eight or ten hares.

Ere we quit the country, however, we must take fome notice of a more dignified and profitable purfuit, in which feveral great land-owners are at prefent occupied, and is profecuted by fome with enthufiafm. This is agriculture upon the principles of the modern english and german farmers, and especially the culture of clover. Mr. John Richter, a German, has the honour of being the first who fowed the first feeds of this improvement in rural æconomy, which is now making fuch rapid progrefs in Ruffia. At the time of his leaving Germany, about twelve years ago, Schubart's improvements in agriculture were just come into high vogue. Full of the advantages which they might produce, he praifed them in an emphatical manner to major Nedderhof, in whofe family at Mofco he was, and who takes great pleafure in farming. He had fenfe enough quickly to perceive the benefits likely to arife from these innovations, and zealoufly fet about fludying Schubart's publication. Richter now wrote to Leipfick, at his request, for a parcel of clover-feed; and he began to make experiments in miniature, according to Schubart's directions, at his eftate of Yellne. Thefe attempts fucceeded, and the whole farm at Yellne was foon conducted with great advantage on Schubart's principles. An acquaintance of the family, general Blankenagel, was ftruck with the improvements, and introduced them with great fuccefs into his village : this excited in him the patriotic patriotic wifh to make his countrymen in general acquainted with the progrefs he had made in this fpecies of culture. He therefore, in conjunction with Richter, adopted the plan of compreffing Schubart's work, and translated it with the neceffary alterations for fuiting it to the locality of Ruffia. But, just as they were beginning to put their defign in execution, they were accidentally feparated: the general however profecuted and completed it alone.

Rafnodofíky, at his inftance, flood forward as teacher of the improved practice, and began by publishing a book, under the title of: New Agriculture *; confifting chiefly of 'tranflations from the writings of Schubart, pointing out at the fame time the progrefs which the improved culture had made in feveral parts of Ruffia. This was in a manner the fignal for an almost general revolt against the old formal practice, and clover met with the greater number of partizans, as the price of hay had been rifing for feveral years. The alterations likewife were more eafily brought about, as here are no combinations and prefcriptive rights to contend with, but the lord of a village can manage his fields and grounds as he pleafes.

In

In Tfehaffovna the new principles of agriculture prevail unconfined; and the culture of clover is completely introduced. The proprietor annually cuts about ten thoufand pood of clover, which he flacks under a moveable roof, according to Schubart's plan, with ventilators. The ruflian plough has given place to the englifh. Sowing-machines, winnowing-machines, and other implements of hufbandry of recent invention are found ufeful to the improvement and profit of agriculture.

It is unreafonable, however, entirely to negleft the capital for the fake of the podmofkovnies. We will therefore return, and once more — fwallow duft.

Between the river Mofkva and the walls of the Kreml is an extremely pleafant walk which we have not yet vifited, the QUAY. The first propofal of it came from knæs Proforoffky, about ten years fince, while he was governor of Mofco. Allées, english walks, beds of flowers, and verdant lawns alternately intermingle, and give to the whole an animated and delightful appearance. This place was for a long time the fashionable refort of the beau monde. The parts around were covered with coaches that had brought the ladies and gentlemen to the walks from from all quarters of the town, and the quay fwarmed with perfons of all ranks to fuch a degree that it was with difficulty one could move about. At prefent it is entirely deferted, partly from the caprice of all-powerful fafhion, who extends her fceptre as defpotically over promenades as over fhawls and head-dreffes; but likewife in fome meafure from the place being furrounded with buildings. The margin of the river Mofkva, which was formerly bordered with trees, is now provided with a granit quay, and the revolution in the buildings of the Kremil extends its effects even to this fpot. It is almoft entirely covered with blocks of ftone and materials for building.

The walks which occupy a confiderable part of the Bielgorod are far more numeroufly frequented. The ruins of the ramparts, which encompafied this quarter of the city, are removed, the place is levelled, and planted with a double row of trees — a beautiful plot of ground, which does honour to the activity and tafte of the prefent maitre-de-police Kaverin.

Mofco is generally indebted for many benefits to the fpirit and induftry of this perfonage. The pavement was never kept in fo good a condition as for fome years paft : impaffable and dangerous ways are levelled, and may now be paffed with

with the greateft convenience. Swampy diffricts are converted into pleafant fituations, and the muddy canals are cleanfed. One thing, however, is greatly to be wilhed for, that the ftreets could be cleaned in a different manner from that now practifed. They are indeed fwept once a-week; but as they are never fprinkled, fuch a duft is raifed by this mode of cleaning, that it is not only offenfive to the fenfes but injurious to the health; at leaft the eyes and the lungs muft certainly fuffer by it. Confidering the number of people that are kept by every family, it would be very cafy to water the ftreets properly, then to fweep them, and carry away the dirt.

One popular diversion still remains to be mentioned, and deferves notice, as it is the principal amufement of all, during the hot feason. I mean the swings in the easter week. These fwings are constructed in various parts of the town, having about them kabaks, booths for puppet-fhows, cook-fhops, and the like: Podnabinsky, however. is the capital scene of this diversion. Here, in a spacious square between Zemlenoigorod and the suburbs, about thirty of these fwings, roundabouts, and ups-and-downs are erected. It is at this joyful feason that here the national propentity to frolicsome passime is is difplayed by the populace to its full extent. Even the fuperior claffes affemble here as fpectators, and form a fecond spectacle extremely interesting. The numerous concourse of perfons of all ranks, who in their elegant equipages drive flowly round the diverting fpot, the goodhumoured gaiety of the populace, the hearty fatisfaction with which they enjoy these amusements, the striking fingularity of the pastimes themselves, give these popular holidays fo peculiar a character, that any obferver, who would take the pains to study the nation in this giddy scene of their entertainment, might feize very ftrong lines for its delineation. He could not fail of catching the universal blithfomeness, with which old and young, childhood and hoary age are animated, and which here is not quickened by a momentary impulse, but is only elevated and placed in its most agreeable light by a congenial opportunity. He will remark the fpirit of courtefy and gallantry, which exhibits itfelf in a thousand little touches, as an etching in the national character by no means indifferent. Here a couple of beggars, whole tattered garments fcarcely afford them a covering, greet one another in the most complaisant and respectful manner; a long ftring of queftions concerning their mutual welfare begins the dialogue, which likewife likewife concludes by a polite embrace. There a young fellow offers to hand his girl, glowing with paint and brandy, into the feat in which both of them are prefently mounted in the air. Even in those superior regions his tenderness does not forfake him. At every anxious agitation of his lady he throws one arm about her waift, that with the other he may fhew his eafe and fecurity by expressive pantomimical gesticulations. - Only one flep farther, and the eye fixes on very different fcenes. The fame people who were before employed in fuch friendly falutations, are now engaged in a difpute which exhaufts the prodigious treasures of ruffian fcurrilities. All that is degrading and exafperating to human nature finds a denomination in this energetic language; and yet the clamorous difputants never lofe their temper. Ufing the most furious gestures, exerting their throats to the utmost pitch of vociferation, amidst a profusion of the most abusive epithets, they fuddenly get fo clofe that their beards almost touch - yet without ever coming to blows. The police, well knowing that there is no danger of life or limb in these fierce debates, cools the heated parties by a shower directed at their heads from a fire-engine, always kept in readinefs on thefe occafions, and found by long experience to be the best instrument for quelling a riot as well as for quenching a conflagration. The whole quarrel is terminated in an inftant, a general fhout of hootings and laughter burfts from the by-ftanders; and the difputants are now running arm in arm to the nearest public house to cement their renovated friendship with a glass of brandy.

In the neighbourhood of the fwings, &c. wooden booths are ufually erected, in which vulgar comedies are performed. Each reprefentation lafts about half an hour, and the price of admittance is five kopeeks. As the crowd is extremely great, and the acting goes on during the whole day, the profits are very confiderable both to the proprietors and the performers, which they divide among themfelves. Thefe latter, as may eafily be fuppo'ed, are not artifts by profession, but mere dilettanti from the inferior classes of the people, who nevertheles, under the mask of the durak *, utter a number of fhrewd and witty conceits.

Though these entertainments are calculated only for the lower orders of people, yet all the fine company of Mofco in a manner partake in them, as there is a continual rotation of elegant

and

and genteel carriages, enjoying the fight of this amufing and diverfified fcene. The Friday in the Eafter week is, however, the grand day for the quality and people of condition. On that day there is a promenade, as it is called, to Podnabinfky, which, in regard to pomp and parade, and the number of vehicles, ranks next to that upon the firft of May.

The winter., — Livelinefs of the city in that feafon. — Common length of its duration. — Praife of the winter. — Amufements of the higher claffes. — The noble affembly. — Mafquerades. — Inconveniences of that fpecies of entertainment. — Concerts. — Tafte for mufic. — Sledge parties. — The Pokroffkaia. — Trotters. — The racing-place. — The ifvofcheiks. — The ice-hills.

THE difagreeable period of duft and dirt is at length over. The want of pavement is amply compenfated by a bountiful fupply of fnow; and the light fledges fly fwiftly through the ftreets. The atmosphere is pure, and the townfman has no longer any reason to envy the inhabitant of the country. IT IS WINTER. What life and agility reign around! The nobility from all parts hafte to the metropolis, the abode of of their relations and friends, the refort of fuperior enjoyments, the fchool of refined manners, the centre of commerce and bufinefs, dear, delightful Morco. The roads are covered with carriages and fledges. Loads of provisions are coming from the remoteft provinces: then the roads are excellent; over rivers and moraffes nature has thrown firm and folid bridges; nothing flands in the way of diligence and induftry.

The winter ufually fets in about the middle of November, often earlier, and lafts till the end of March, confequently for a period of about five months. January and February are undoubtedly the finest part of the winter. The days are then grown longer, the falls of fnow are not fo frequent as before, the air is pure, and the fky bright; and, from the middle of January, the froft feldom exceeds ten degrees by Reaumur's thermometer, being generally not more than four or five degrees. What a pleafure it is, properly clad against the cold, to move about and take exercise in the pure elastic atmosphere of winter! How the body is hardened against distemper, and how alert are all the animal organs! In a good continued winter epidemical difeafes are extremely rare; and if colds and rheums appear on the coming on VOL. II. GG of of a thaw, they are immediately difperfed by the returning froft. Even the plague, which about thirty years fince raged at Mofco, was forced to yield to its falutary influence. The appearance of the city is likewife incomparably more agreeable than in the fummer. A brilliant white is reflected from the palaces and houfes. The fight is nowhere fhocked by dirt or impurity. The houfes, the ftreets and fquares are neat and clean. The mephitic vapours with which the atmosphere of large cities is always charged, no longer offend the olfactory organs. The uncontaminated breath of nature is invigorating to the fpirits and delightful to the fenfe.

Affemblies, mafquerades, concerts, the drama, form the entertainment of the fuperior ranks at this feafon of the year. We will haftily run through them, and then mingle in the chearful throng that celebrate the maflanitza, or the butter-week.

The prime grand inflitution for diffipation frequented by the nobility is the NOBLE AS-SEMBLY*. This affembly is held once a-week, in a houfe fitted up and appropriated to that ufe. Here may be had all forts of provisions and refreshments. In fome of the rooms are card-tables. From time to time balls and concerts are given. This fociety has fubfilted for feveral years; and almost the whole nobility of Mofco, of both fexes, are fubfcribers. It is extremely well conducted, is poffeffed of great funds, and is likely to continue long. The MAS-QUERADES are under the direction of Mr. Maddox, and are given during the carnival or butter-They are particularly numerous and week. brilliant on the last days of the maslanitza, the week immediately preceding paffion-week. The last masquerade, on the funday of the first week in Lent, lasts from the morning early till twelve at night. The grand malquerade-hall at the play-houfe is a beautiful production of architecture, and conveniently holds four thousand perfons. Otherwife, this fpecies of entertainment is not particularly interefting, and in many respects is very troublesome. Masks in character are but feldom feen; dominos and cloaks are the ufual dreffes, and many perfons are totally unmasked. There is little dancing, as the hall is filled by the company walking to and fro; and it is often with great difficulty that one can move about. On account of the multitude of carriages, you must often wait upwards of an hour in the street before there is a possibility of getting out for admiffion. But it is still worfe GG2

at endeavouring to go home. Befet by a hoft of elamorous fervants in the antechambers, running about to look for their mafters, or bawling for their carriages, is already difagreeable enough; but the turmoil and perplexity is greatly increafed in endeavouring to procure your own, which is frequently flationed at the diftance of a verft or more from the porch of the mafquerade-houfe. While waiting in the cold corridores we have plenty of time to bewail the folly of mafquerades, and to form good refolutions for the future.

CONCERTS are given during Lent. The principal performers of Europe vifit Mofco at this time, and find it more profitable to them than any other city in the world, London and Petersburg perhaps excepted. The violinist Hempel, the female finger Zaporiti, the blind fluteplayer Delon, and, in fhort, the famous performer on the harpfichord Hæssler, who have frequented this town for feveral years, will vouch for the truth of what is here afferted. The tickets for the concerts cost from two to five rubles, and the hall is never thinly filled. Several admirers of mufic, in opulent circumstances, take fifty or a hundred of these tickets, for the fake of encouraging the talents of the performers; who, befides, find another fource of gain, no lefs productive, productive, in giving leffons in mufic during their ftay at Mofco. The pay for an hour is commonly five rubles to thefe capital artifts, but the ordinary mufic-mafters, though competent in their way, are by no means fo richly paid. They are likewife engaged for private concerts, which yield them alfo a bountiful harveft. The paffion for mufic is very general in Mofco, and the harpfichord-players, Hæfsler, Weydenhammer, Scidler, Bouleau, and others, who are employed in giving leffons, earn yearly feveral thoufand rubles.

Large and magnificent SLEDGE-PARTIES, peculiarly formed for that purpofe, are here not often feen; probably becaufe the long duration of the fledge-ways deprives this diversion of the charm of rarity, and finks it to the level of ordinary and every-day things. In various ftreets little fledges stand for hire, as hackney-coaches do in London, in readinefs to be taken for going from one place to another of this fpacious city, or merely for a drive. But, the whole winter through, especially on Sundays, there is a vaft concourfe of equipages and fledges in the Pokroffkaia, a long strait street in the neighbourhood of the german flobode. The fineft and fleetest horses, as well as the most elegant fledges, are here brought forth to captivate at-GG3 tention.

tention. The fledges, however, of this country are not made in those fanciful and allegorical forms, nor have that curious carved-work fo much admired in the fledges of Germany; they are of a fimple, light, and convenient construction, without any carvings or ornaments. Neither are the horfes loaded with heavy gear, and the little bells are here not known. The fledges are made of good durable stuff, covered with fine cloth or plush, and are provided with a bearfkin bag, in which those who fit in them put their feet. The horfe-trappings are neat and handfome without being cumbrous. The fleeteft and most admired geldings are those that confantly go in a quick trot, without ever getting into a gallop. They are called TROTTERS. If the fledge be drawn by two horfes, then, according to the rules of etiquette here obferved, one of them gallops while the other continually trots; and if a man does not drive by this rule, he had better not make his appearance in the Pokrofskaia, or at least not on the RACING-PLACE.

The RACING-PLACE is on the river Mofco, as at Peterfburg it is on the Neva, not far from the ftone bridge. Here, on the ice of the river, a courfe of a verft in length is fet off by pofts, with a line of pofts down the middle to feparate thofe thofe who go one way from fuch as come the other. On the fides are ftands and fcaffolds for the fpectators. On this courfe every Sunday races are run, at which an extraordinary enthufiafm is obfervable. Wagers are feldom laid in money; the whole conteft being for the fuperlative honour of being known to poffels the fleeteft nag in Mofco.

This kind of races arifes frequently in the ftreets; when two ISVOSCHEIKS * happen to come abreaft with one another, both proud of the ability of their horfes, neither will let the other get before him, and immediately the fharp conteft begins. Even on fuch occasions participating spectators are not wanting, who encourage the antagonists by acclamations, give the victor their applause, and punish the vanquished by laughing at his rafhness.

The ICE-HILLS in the butter-week are a fort of break-neck diversion wherein the common people take great fatisfaction, and which fets the intrepidity and dexterity of the natives in the clearest light. From a high steep fcassfold covered with blocks of ice, smoothed every night by quantities of water thrown from the summit, the little steep shoot down with the states of an arrow. On either fide is a tremendous abyfs formed by the height of the hill; and the flightest unskilfulness or imprudence of the perfon in the fledge may turn it from its direction and be attended with the most dreadful confequence. But incomparably more dangerous is this fpot on fkaits. Till one is used to this fight, it almost makes the hair stand on end to fee the hundreds that follow one another in endlefs fucceffion on fkaits and in fledges down this amazing precipice. Yet accidents fcarcely ever happen. Indeed, if we confider that the ice is equally glib, it is impoffible that he who begins the defcent after another should ever overtake him, and therefore it is not likely that any collifion can enfue. The impetus acquired by this fall carries the fledges and fkaiters almost half a verst on the level ice below; bringing them to the oppofite ice-hill, up which they afcend by fteps behind, with a fledge at their back, and this returns them to the former. The higheft and most frequented ice-hills are those erected on the Moskva and the Neglinnaia. At these places are alfo fhow-booths and victuallers, much vifited and admired by that part of the public for whom these amusements are calculated. The crowd around, and the various fcenes, are the fame with those already described in speaking of the the diverfions of the Eafter week. Women as well as men enjoy the diverfion of the ice-hills with the fame avidity; and it is impoffible to avoid comparing the appearance they prefent to a vaft cataract of human figures.

Moral character of the Mofcovites. — Hofpitality. — Pleafures of the table. — Play. — Political difcuffions.
— Toleration. — Influence thereof on friendfhip, edu— eation, and marriage. — Companionable toleration.
— Beneficence. — Liberal way of thinking in the Mofcovites in regard to wealth and flation.

HOSPITALITY is a leading feature in the national character of the Ruffians, which is fo much the more confpicuous, as that virtue is not nearly fo extensive among the other nations of our quarter of the globe. It is certainly one of the most amiable virtues that are comprized under the name of humanity. Freely to welcome the stranger under our roof, to give him food and drink, without respect of person or condition, whether he be Creesfus or Irus, Apollo or Vulcan — what an amiable people, amongst whom this pure and difinterested hofpitality pitality is a native cuftom ! In those provinces of Ruffia, which lie the most remote from european refinements, that fair flower of the patriarchal ages is still indigenous; but in Mosco, Petersburg, and the other enlightened parts of Ruffia, hospitality, though it has lost that elevated, godlike character, yet continues to be among the engaging virtues of their inhabitants.

Every one, whether acquaintance or ftranger. who neither by condition nor manners is of the vulgar clafs, finds a hearty welcome in the houfe of a generous Molcovite: and the longer he flays, the better he is liked; especially in the country, where time is apt fometimes to hang heavy on hand. It is not to be denied, that interest and covetousnels, or flattery and convenience, and one cannot fay what elfe, are now and then the porters at the gate; that here and there, wealth, rank, beauty, certain accommodations or companionable talents, fuch as skill in play, the powers of entertaining, especially the facility of retailing news, give greateft pretenfions to a good reception : but this is likewife the cafe everywhere; and where is the country, at leaft in Europe, whofe inhabitants are not liable to this observation? But, in general, a perfon may go into every houfe in Mofco, where he has once been prefented, without any ceremony, uninvited, and, if he choofe, appear every day at table, without the least apprehension of the master being denied to him, or of being looked upon with an evil eye. Neither has he any reason to fear that his unexpected prefence may create confusion in the family; as it is the practice here to fet out the table every day, as if it were for an entertainment : for even in families of moderate fortunes, the table is ordinarily furnished with ten or twelve dishes, generally well-dreffed, and of exquisite quality. A pretty defert is feldom wanting; and, befides the ufual table-wine, feveral of the finer forts and liqueurs are ferved round. Hence it happens, that a man of a weak ftomach feldom rifes from table, without being fmitten by his confcience for having tranfgreffed his rules of diet; especially if he has indulged in the jocundity into which, in fuch circumftances, he may eafily be furprifed. A cultomary ruffian meal confifts of one or more cold difhes by way of luncheon, hams, bacon. dried tongues, caviar, bread, cheefe, butter, &c. which are taken at a fide-board while the cloth is laying for dinner. This is composed of a ftrong meat-foup, and fchtfchi *, fucceeded by three or four feafoned ragouts, roafts, paltry, and feveral kinds of grain prepared with milk, and in which no nation comes up to the Ruffians. The defert, as everywhere elfe, is made up of comfits and fruits. The ordinary table-wines are Medoc and Chateau-Margot; befides, porter and englifh ale, quas and mcad *, which are always placed on the table, that the guefts may help themfelves when they pleafe, without fpeaking to a fervant. The wines that at most tables are handed round, are Hungary, Malaga, Champagne, Burgundy, Madeira, Cyprus, Mosler, Rhenish, called in England Old Hock, &c. The nalif ki, or liqueurs, are cherries, cranberries, goofeberries, currants, &c. in brandy, noyaux, and the like.

In the forenoon a relifh is taken of pickled herring, caviar, or fmoked meats, with a glafs of aqua-vitæ, which is here called a fchelken. In the fchelken the ladies as well as gentlemen all take part. The ufual time for fitting down to dinner is at one or two o'clock at lateft, and the fupper is ferved at nine or ten; fometimes, however, later, when the company is numerous, and the rubbers of whift are not over.

In general the pleafures of the table are here in high effimation, and the fame of the man who * Quas and mead are two ruffian drinks, whereof the former is ufed inftead of fmall beer; and is brewed from meal, balm, mint and water. The other is composed of honey and water. Both are extremely refreshing.

keeps a good kitchen, flies from mouth to mouth. Acquaintances are ufually not formed till this matter is properly explained; and an excellent table gives a claim to the moft brilliant companies. "There is glorious eating and drinking at their houfe," is no fmall praife to any family; and the man who has a fine tafte, and knows how to give favoury difhes, or is a good judge in wines, plays no inferior part in fociety.

Even at dinner and at the tea-table, play is generally the fubject of converfation. Perfons of the greateft gravity hold it not beneath their dignity to analyze the games of whift, and to make profound difquifitions on them. With a face of the utmost importance, and with a power of recollection that indeed is aftonishing, they relate the most interesting events of the yesterday's party. What cards each player held, what card he led, what others were played to it, for what reasons, what were the confequences all this is delivered with the most perfect circum. stantiality, and attended to with confummate patience.

A better and more interesting topic of converfation is the politics of the day, which are here discuffed with a liberality and frankness not common elsewhere. The last Hamburgh gazette is discuffed difcuffed and debated without fear or referve; every one taking part in the conversation, according to his fentiments or humour. This shews the good understanding and the mutual confidence that subsist between the government and the nation, and is certainly the best evidence for the goodness of the administration and the contentedness of the people.

One of the finest features of the national character of the Ruffians is certainly their TOLERA TION, which fhines at Mofco in its most brilliant lustre. This popular virtue is the fruit of those laws that have been enacted in this respect by the wife monarchs of Ruffia, fince the æra of Alexey Mikhaïlovitch. Faith, in matters of religion, is here never any detriment to a man. In civil affairs, in focial intercourfe, in friendship, in love, religion is no obstacle to success. The Mofcovite never inquires, whether thou be of Cephas, or of Apollos, or of Paul. Honour and probity are the grounds of his confidence, and amiablenefs of any kind the fource of his attachment. Hence we fee, that even bigotted parents trust the education of their children to a foreigner who is of a different perfuation, if they are but convinced of his honefty. They love and efteem him, though he never attends their their religious rites; and meat is ferved to him at their tables, while they themfelves keep flrict fast.

A man may fafely rely on the friendship of the Russians, when once he has acquired it, in spite of any difference in religion; and marriages between Russians and foreigners are contracted without the least foruple or hesitation.

Befides this religious toleration, here is still another, namely, SOCIAL TOLERATION, which is commonly a mark of good breeding and knowledge of the world. It is in contrast with a propenfity to teftinefs and cavil, and forms the bafis of good behaviour in company, and of a chearful and eafy communication of fentiments and ideas. This fpecies of toleration is likewife univerfal in Mofco. Every one may deliver his particular conceptions and notions on any fubject whatever, without fear of flat contradiction, or of being abashed or confounded by gross replies. No one pretends to force his opinion on others by bawling and clamour, and it feldom happens that the pleafure of fociety is diffurbed by warm Every one rides his hobby-horfe under debates. the fafeguard of focial toleration. In fhort, whatever may be the fource of this virtue, its charms are ineffimable, and its effects beneficial.

Another

Another beautiful characteristic of the Moscovites is entitled to equal praife - it is BENEFI-CENCE. No pauper is fent empty away from the door; on the contrary, they haften to the indigent to offer their mite. At all family occurrences of confequence, especially at funerals, confiderable fums are distributed in alms, and it is common to purchase the discharge of prisoners by paying their debts. The rich have an eleemofynary day, at leaft once a-week, when all the poor who prefent themfelves, whatever be their country or religious profession, receive money, garments, provisions, &c. according to their feveral necessities, or their different deferts. Private perfons at times endow useful inftitutions of great extent, as the commercial-fchool founded by M. Demidof, the alms-houfes of Kurakin and of Scheremetof, and even the foundling-houfe, which owes its foundation in part to voluntary contributions. Very frequently too, the college of general provision receives confiderable funis for the relief of the diftreffed, and nowhere do collections for any beneficent purpose fill more rapidly than here.

One cuftom more deferves our honourable notice, by which the comforts of fociety are greatly enhanced. Thofe long-tailed, troublefome, minute, and infipid titles, which are ftill forupuloufly fcrupuloufly retained in many parts of Germany, are here but feldom heard. Every one, let his rank and station be what they may, is called by his pronomen with the addition of his father's, and the termination vitch; as, Ivan Makfimovitch, Gavrila Petrovitch, Paphnuti Romanovitch, Pankrati Gregorievitch, &c. and the ladies by adding evna or ovna, instead of vitch; as, Agaphia Romanovna, Yuliana Alexandrovna, Daria Aphanafievna, Anastasia Ivanovna, &c. The knæs and the graf are indeed called illustrious *, and the general, or he who holds an equal rank in the civil department, has the title excellence +; yet in common conversation often only by their names, knæs Ivan Mikhaïlovitch, graf Matphey Petrovitch, &c. This laudable cuftom is even generally adopted by the Germans, and is obferved even in fpeaking their native language. In fhort, the pride of titles and rank, of wealth or fcience, is here extremely rare. Whether you are noble or not; whether you reckon your income by thousands or by hundreds, no man ever inquires. Station is honourable ; but moderate circumstances are no difgrace. A man is fure of being the first person in company, if he be the most agreeable.

Education. — Exertions on the part of parents. — Styls of mofeovite education. — Regard for the french language. — Aptnefs of the young ladies for playing on the harpfichord. — Defects in the education of females. — Requifites for a good tutor. — French mafters. — German mafters. — The Datka and the Nenka. — Vifin's Nedorofl.

OF the public fchools we have already had occafion to fpeak: we fhall here fay fomething concerning the private tuition, as it is conducted by domeffic teachers, or in boarding-fchools.

In Mofco, as well as throughout all Ruffia, education is treated with all the importance that it deferves. Perfons of opulence and diffinction are not fparing of expence, in order to give their children a good education; not only paying the domeftic tutor a falary of a thoufand rubles and upwards, but likewife having the beft mafters for mufic, dancing, drawing, &c. fo that the education of the children in great houfes coft feveral thoufand rubles annually. Thefe exertions are certainly highly praife-worthy; but, on the other hand, the mode of education in general, which is now become the fafhion, is extremely reprehenfible. henfible. This feems to be the proper term, though it could hardly be expected that fashion should have anything to do in the management of an a<sup>q</sup>air of fo much importance as education; yet when fome defective practice becomes the object of general imitation, it can only be explained from the caprices of that wanton goddefs:

We shall here take the liberty to make a few remarks on the prevailing mode of iducation in Mosco, with that different frankness which ought always to characterise such as wish to do good.

The knowledge of languages, and the graces of the perfon, feem to be the foremost confiderations in the mind of the generality of parents, if not the only points to which the labours of the tutor ought to tend. Hence it arifes, that in the choice of a preceptor far lefs attention is paid to the fcience and erudition that he poffeffes, and his integrity, than to a brilliant exterior. The chief requifite of all is, that he fpeak french well: for among all claffes the learning of this language is the prime concern. Accordingly, it is by no means furprifing that the important bufinefs of education fhould be committed to ignorant and uninformed perfons, and occafionally even to men of diffolute manners, if they only fpeak french with a proper accent, and can difcourfe with fluency on ordinary topics. This must needs be a great differvice HH 2 differvice to the community, to which they may perhaps return young men exceedingly well' skilled in foreign languages, but totally unaccomplifhed in head and heart. There are furely higher and better qualities which ought to be looked for from education, fuch as have been reckoned of great weight in all ages, and by all nations, that are not fubject to the dominion of fashion, that ever retain their value, that are recommended as the only condition on which true happinefs is to be obtained, and whereon, in fhort, everything depends: they are, Wildom and Virtue. Who will venture to affirm, after this, that the learning of languages and the acquiring of the graces fhould be the principal aim of the teacher? Who fees not, how miftakenly those parents act, who in the felection of a tutor have no regard to character and found learning, but look folely to skill in languages, and the art of figuring in the world? It is not to be denied, that the learning of foreign tongues, and especially the french, fince it is fo generally fpoken, particularly in all courts, fhould no more be neglected than the elegancies of behaviour; it is only pretended here that education ought not to be confined to them alone. By the formation of the exterior, is to be underflood not only what is called a good addrefs in company, but in general

general whatever adds to the charms and agreeablenefs of perfon, as dancing, mufic, drawing, riding, fencing, &c. The three former are particularly attended to, after the french tongue, in the education of young ladies. In fact, our aftonishment is often excited at the progress that is made in these arts; in many families are some juvenile performers, especially on the harpfichord, who may vie with the greatest masters; and even, while children, exhibit their talents in public concerts. How prejudicial this latter circumftance must be, especially to a young woman of fashion, is obvious to every one. Certainly all the daughters of noble families in Mofco fpeak french, and many of them in the greatest perfection ; but about houshold affairs, about the duties of mothers and wives, they know just as little as the maid that dreffes them. Yet the parents would take it much amifs if they were told that their daughters had no education. How! it would be answered, our daughter, who speaks french fo well, who plays fo mafterly on the harpfichord, who dances like an angel, who is the, delight and the foul of all companies; fhe has no education? - " It shall be just as you " pleafe, madam : but permit me to fay, that " there is a good and a bad education. The <sup>66</sup> former principally aims at forming the head ss and ни 3

" and the heart; and those matters, of which " you and the lady your daughter make fo much account, hold only a fecondary rank; whereas the latter does exactly the reverse, as you, madam, very well know, or in tutoring the hands and the feet, oftentimes entirely forgets the cultivation of the heart and mind."

For the education of boys, a man is ufually fought out who can teach french and german, mathematics, geography, hiftory, natural hiftory, and natural. philosophy. Parents, however, inquire more concerning those fciences, mathematics excepted, to which their children ought principally to apply, as being mostly intended for the military. If the tutor can play on the harpfichord, or can draw, particularly if he have withal a good figure and genteel deportment, he is an exquifite perfon; the best families engage in rivalships for him; and he is certain of having a very confiderable falary and diffinguished treatment. Concerning his knowledge and abilities he must have a testimonial from the university, or from the director of the normal schools, certifying that he has undergone an examination; which at prefent is pretty fevere.

The number of domestic tutors in Mosco is confiderable; mostly Frenchmen and Germans. Among the former are many adventurers, who have have formerly been perruquiers, valets de chambres, cuifiniers, and one-cannot tell what, who either from indigence or ambition have turned their talents to teaching. This fort of people even renders the name of utfchitel, tutor, contemptible in Ruffia, which is otherwife certainly an honorable title. The german informators, as they are called, are, generally fpeaking, men of learning in the proper fenfe of the term, who are not come at a venture into the country, but have been written for on the recommendation of fome competent friend. They are likewife generally the most efteemed as perfons of great knowledge and a decent irreproachable behaviour.

Another fault in the education here is in the cuftom of committing children from their infancy to the care and guidance of certain male and female attendants, called the Dætka and the Nenka. Thefe are vaffals commonly taken from the houfhold fervants, and refemble much the pædagogues of the ancients, being not only the nurfes and attendants of the children, but are appointed to direct and to chide them. Though the beft and moft trufty are picked out for thefe pofts; yet it is nearly impoffible to find among this clafs of people any that are poffeffed of fuch qualities as a man would exactly choofe

to trust with the management of his children in that period of their youth which is perhaps the most important of all: for it often happens afterwards, that all the pains an expert preceptor can beftow will not heal the perversities of the mind, or correct the deviations of the heart, which have arifen from their long habits of intercourfe with the dætka and nenka, perhaps without being confcious of it; the most abfurd and ridiculous prejudices being ufually the first aliment with which they feed the curiofity of the opening intellect. Most of them are very strong in fairy tales, in general fo extremely filly that they must palfy the best understanding. This chapter may properly be concluded by a fhort extract from Visin's Nedoroll, a favourite piece of the ruffian drama, as affording a just notion of this nenkery and utichitelfhip at Mofco. NEDO-ROSI. fignifies the minor, the child. It is true that, fince the first appearance of this play, many alterations have taken place in this respect ; yet originals may here and there be found for Vi-'fin's picture. A boy of twelve or fourteen is the hero of this piece. He never appears without his nenka, who always walks behind her Mitrophanuschka (his name in the diminutive) in great concern and anxiety to do whatever may please him and keep him quiet: now bringing bringing him little feathers to blow about the room with his breath, then fhewing him how to make foap-bubbles, at which the looby teftifies great fatisfaction. But he is most of all delighted with a clapper of paper, and which he handles with great dexterity, going with it first to frighten his worthy papa, and then his no lefs worthy uncle, which he artfully does to the great diversion of all. The parents, who are represented as living at their country-manfion in one of the diftant provinces, begin at length to think that it is just the proper period to put young Mitrophanuschka into the hand of tutors; and the refolution is immediately adopted of taking a journey to town, as the uncle, who has a very decifive voice in the family-deliberations, affures them of its being high time for that purpofe, as in town many lads have quite finished their education at fifteen. On the arrival of the family in town, therefore, the first bufinefs is to find tutors for Mitrophanufchka. They are found. They bring good recommendations with them. They are engaged. One of them, a parish-clerk, is to torment the youth, as mamma calls it, with teaching him the ruffian alphabet; the fecond, a Frenchman, is to instruct him in his language. The hours of application are begun. Mitrophanuschka weeps bitterly, bitterly, and will not, by any perfuafion, be brought to fix his eyes on the book. He puts his fingers in his ears, while the parifh-clerk, with his drawling fchoolmafter-accent, is bawling to him his As, buki, vedi, glagol, dobro. yeft, jivété, &c. * At length the Nenka, who never forfakes her poor Mitrophanufchka in this hour of torment, by bringing him fugar-plumbs and cakes and the paper clapper, furceeds at leaft fo far as to make him leave off crying. The bufinefs now feems to take a favourable turn. The schoolmaster screams his letters: Mitrophanuschka munches comfits, accompanying the melody of his teacher, at intervals, with the found of his clapper, and even occafionally muttering out a letter; while the Nenka is inceffantly coaxing the dear child with all her arts and ingenuity to mind his book. The parifh-clerk having finished his hour, retires; and now the Frenchman appears. With him af-

* By the way, this will be no improper place for making the reader acquainted with the names of the letters of the ruffian all habet. As, buki, védi, glagol, dobro, yeft, jivété, zemlia, ijé, kako, liudi, muifliété, nachè, one, pokoï, rtfi, flovo, tverdo, u, ferte, khiere, tfi, cherf, fcha, fchtfcha, yérè, yeri, yer, yati, yu, ya. Formerly among thefe were alfo the letters i, zélo, yé, kfi, pfi, phita, and ijitfa; but they have of late years been difufed by literary perfons.

fairs are fliding into a better train; and Mitrophanuschka gets through this hour by the help of fweetmeats and his clapper. The parents are charmed with both pupil and tutor, and all goes on as it fhould. In the evening of this day the family receives a vifit from an aunt, who has not long been come from Peterfburg, where fhe has paffed fome years: the converfation chiefly turns on the clever young Mitrophanuschka: they tell the aunt that the occasion of their journey to town was folely for the fake of giving this darling boy an education fuitable to his rank: they talk in high terms of the great progrefs he has made in only one day, at the fame time doing ample justice to his tutors, who are extolled as perfons of uncommon talents. But they dwell with particular emphafis on the merits of the amiable Frenchman whom they have been fo happy as to engage. The aunt, a great admirer of that nation, requests to have him introduced to her. He is fent for, and prefently appears. " Goodlack !" fhe immediately exclaims, " this is my peterfburg coach-" man!" The ci-devant coachman lofes nothing of his prefence of mind at this difcovery; but, expreffing his joy at finding an old acquaintance, kiffes her hand ; and fhe, according to the ruffian cuftom, prefents to him her cheek : thus thus all continues in the former train. The detection excites not the fmalleft averfion in the parents, who content themfelves with faying: Well, he is however a Frenchman — on the contrary, their fatisfaction is rather increafed by the circumftance of his being known to the aunt, who gives him a good character. The metamorphofed coachman mixes in company with the gentlemen of the houfe, the peterfburg aunt fits down to a party at Ombre, and all divert themfelves with the recollection of former times.

Létopis Nestorova. - Chronicle of Nestor, 1 vol. 4to. St. Petersburg, 1767. - This chronicle was published from a manufcript found at Kœnigfburg, and has been confidered by the ableft critics as the most faithful of all. Neither the Poles, the Bohemians, the Serbes, the Vendes, nor any other of the flavonian nations, are able to boaft of an hiftorian of fuch high antiquity. He was born in 1056, and at the age of fixteen entered himfelf of the petfcherskian monastery at Kief, where he died at a pretty advanced age. His reputation for purity of life obtained him a place among the faints. His work clofes with the year 1115. With the following year commences the narrative of his continuator Sylvefter, dean of the monaftery of St. Michael at Kief, and afterwards bishop of Pereiaslavl. The other continuators of this chronicle, which breaks off at the year 1206, are not known.

The ftyle of Neftor is plain and fimple throughout; it being chiefly his intent to preferve the remembrance of facts without embellifhment. His fimplicity, however, does not entirely exclude eloquence. He fays nothing of the memoirs which he followed for the times anterior to thole in which he wrote: but it is eafy to difcover that he did not work upon merely oral tradition, and that he had before him the manufcripts which he has neglected to cite. It is proved by authentic documents, that fo early as the time time of Oleg, in the ninth century, the Ruffians had the art of writing, fince from that period they made teftaments, contracts, and treaties. Neftor and his continuators have been careful to note down in their chronicle the appcarance of comets, eclipfes, and other celeffial phænomena.

Letopis Nikonova. — Chronicle of Nikon, 2 vol. 4to. St. Peterfburg, 1767. — This chronicle is not properly the work of the patriarch Nikon, whom we have feen playing a great part under the reign of tzar Alexey. But that prelate employed fome of the leifure procured him by his difgrace, in collecting a great number of chronicles, collating them, correcting one by the other, perhaps fometimes in altering them; and, having done this, he made a copy of the whole, in which he placed fo much confidence, that he pronounces an anathema againft any who fhould dare to make any alteration in it. This work brings us down to the reign of tzar Alexey; but the two volumes that are printed conclude at the invafion of Ruffia by the Tartars.

Kniga Stepennaïa, 2 vol. 4to. St. Petersburg, 1777. — The book of degrees — 15 entitled because in it the hiftory of the fovereigns of Russia is disposed according to the order of their defeent: thus, when the father has for his fuccessfor his fon and his grandfon, they together form only one degree; and another degree commences when the throne passes a collateral heir. This book is not a chronicle, but a history begun in the fourteenth century by the metropolitan Kyprian, in the reign of Dmitry Donsky, and continued in the fixteenth century by the metropolitan Makhary under tzar Ivan Vassillievitch. This work is very defervedly esteemed, and the copies of it were accordingly multiplied, till at last it was printed by the care of the learned M. Muller, counsellor of the college of foreign affairs, affairs, and one of the moft illuftrious members of the academy of feiences at St. Peterfburg. The authors of it, however, are juftly reprehensible, for having fometimes too lightly deviated from the text of the ancient writers of the chronicles, for fupplying the place of it with falfe and ridiculous traditions, and often fpoiling their work by accounts of prodigies for the fake of pleafing the monks of their time. They had no notion of the rules of found criticifm; and their flyle, though dignified, is often turgid, and fails of infpiring us with the fame confidence as that of the honeft Neftor and his continuators.

Transformery Letopiffets. — Trarian chronicle, 1 vol. 4to. St. Petersburg, 1772. — It conducts us from the year 1114 to the year 1472; but there is a confiderable chasm in it. Every transaction, in the original manufeript, is accompanied with a miniature representation of it. It may be conjectured, that this copy, being ornamented at fo great expence, was made for tzar Alexey, who was very euricus of information. Though it be not extremely ancient, it is not the lefs worthy of confidence, and should be confidered as an extract, carefully made from the ancient chronicles written by contemporaries with the facts. The ehronological order is accurately preferved in it, the very style of the authors is retained, and the various phænomena of the skies are noted.

Drewney Letopiffets. — Ancient chronicle, 2 vol. 4to. St. Peterfburg, 1774—75. — It is printed from a copy ornamented like the foregoing, and made for the ufe, it may be prefumed, of the fame prince. It runs on from the reign of Alexander Neffky to the year 1424.

Tzarstvennaïa Kniga. — The tzarian book, 1 vol. 4to. St. Petersburg, 1769. — This is another copy refembling the two former. It contains the history of tzar Ivan Vaffillievitch, fillievitch, to the year 1553, who followed the conquest of Kazan.

Opiffanie Kniazia Kourbfkago. — Hiftory of tzar Ivan Vaffillievitch, by prince Kourbfkoy. The author was a witnefs of moft of the facts which he relates; having ferved at the fiege of Kazan, and having had a command during the war of Livonia. Having fallen under the difpleafure of tzar Ivan, and dreading his vengeance, he fled into Poland. From this place of his retreat he addreffes his work to that prince himfelf, particularizing and reproaching him boldly with his cruelties. The tzar condefcended to anfwer him; and, without denying the facts with which he is charged, he related, in vindication of himfelf, the caufes of complaint he had againft his fubjects. The performance of Kourbfkoy and that of the tzar are two valuable monuments which are preferved only in the manufeript.

Letopis o Miatéyakh. — Chronicle of the troubles of Molco, 1 vol. 8vo. St. Peterfburg, 1771. — It begins at the reign of Feodor, fon of tzar Ivan Vaffillievitch, and ends at the reign of Alexey. If the author has not dived into the cabinets of thofe who were at the head of affairs in the times whereof he writes, he was at leaft very well informed of whatever could come to the knowledge of a private attentive observer. The epocha which he comprifes is one of the most interesting in all the history of Ruffia.

Sinopfis, 1 vol. 8vo. St. Peterfburg. The work of a credulous monk; being a dry abridgement of a part of ruffian hiftory, where fome important transactions are haftily noticed, while the author dwells with fatisfaction on a number of idle and abfurd tales, invented in the cloifters. This little book went through feven editions; becaufe nothing better had then been publifhed.

Tadre

Yadro Roffijkoy Iftorii. — Abridgment of ruffian hiftory, 1 vol. 8vo. Moiko, 1770. — An excellent work of prince Khilkof, ambaffador from Ruffia in Sweden, and detained prifoner by the Swedes contrary to the laws of nations, when Peter I. in 1700 declared war againft Charles XII. He died when juft on the point of recovering his liberty, and it was during his captivity that he wrote this work, which he finithes at the battle of Pultava.

Kazan/kai I/loriia. — Hiftory of Kazan, by M. Ritchkof, 1 vol. 8yo. St. Petersburg, 1767. — The author drew up his work from a chronicle which he found at Kazan, and he has enriched it with feveral curious investigations.

Vvédénié k Astrakhanskoy Topographii. — Introduction to the topography of Astrakhan, 1 vol. 8vo. St. Petersburg, 1774. — A work of the fame author.

Opiffanie Slutchaief Kaffaiutchikhfia do Azova. — Account of the events which relate to the city of Azof, 1 vol. 8vo. St. Peterfburg, 1768. — The learned work of M. Baër, profeffor of oriental languages at the academy of fciences st St. Peterfburg. The original is in german.

Izvefliya Vizantiifkikh istorikof. — Extracts from the byzantine historians. — M. Stritter has under this title collected all the passages in the historians of Byzantium that relate to the northern hives who contributed to the ruin of the roman empire.

Istoriya Skiphskaïa. — History of the Scythians. — A work, in manufcript of the stolnik Lizlof, who lived under the reign of tzar Mikhaïla Pheodorovitch. It would be very ufeful, if it were not superfeded, as to the history of the Tartars of Kazan and Astrakhan, by the writings of M. Ritchkof.

Kratkoy Letopiffets Lomonofova. — Brief chronology of Lomonofof, 1 vol. 8vo. St. Petersburg, 1760. — It is vol. 11. impoffible impoffible to include more matter in the flort fpace of fifty pages. This little work is followed by the genealogy of the monarchs of Ruffia, and their alliances.

Roveft o Samozvantfakb. — Hiftory of the impoftors, by prince Schtfcherbatof, 1 vol. 8vo. St. Peterfburg, 1774. Under this title the author has compiled the hiftory of the adventurers, who, under falfe names, have attempted to ufurp the throne of Ruffia. This work is almost entirely taken from the chronicle of the troubles of Mosco, and the abridgment of prince Khilkof. Annexed to it is a relation of the outrages of Stenka Radzin.

Istoriya Roffifkaia Tatifchtscheva. - History of Ruffia, by M. Tatifehtfchef, privy-counfellor, 3 vols. 4to: - The thor, who lived under the empress Anne, took on himself nearly the fame talk with Nikon. It is fearcely poffible to imagine that any one has ever collected and collated fuch a great number of chronicles as this writer. He industriously employed himfelf for thirty years in correcting and completing these chronicles one from the other, in modernizing, the ftyle, and in making immenfe refearches into the antiquitics of his country, from which he has drawn bold confequences, frequently very doubtful. As he feldom cites the chronicles he has followed, and gives no reafon for his preferring fome to the others, what degree of confidence should be placed in his work cannot be afcertained. He had brought it down to the reign of Feodor, fon of tzar Ivan Vaffillievitch; but the three volumes that are printed terminate at the invation of the Tartais, and the reft was loft in a fire.

Iftoriya Roffii/kaia kn. Schtfcherbatova. — Hiftory of Ruffia, by prince Schtfcherbatof, 3 vols. 4to. St. Peterfburg, 1770 -71 and 74. — The author always cites his authorities, which upon reference are as often found to correspond. If the

the prime character of a hiftorian be the love of truth, this prince deferves the higheft praifes.

Jilié Petra Velikago. — Life of Peter the Great, 2 vols. 4to. — printed for the first time in the flavonian language, at Venice, and reprinted in 1774 at St. Petersburg, with notes by prince Schtscherbatof. A work abounding in curious remarks. The author being only intent on the veracity of his narrative, is careless of ornament. He is faid to be a prelate of a flavonian church in the turkish dominions.

Istoryia Petra Velikago. — Hiftory of Peter the Great, by Pheophane Prokopovitch, archbishop of Novgorod, 1 vol. 8vo. St. Petersburg, 1773. — The author had an intimate knowledge of his hero, who frequently condefeended to ask his advice. His work finishes after the battle of Pultava. It is thought by some perfons that this book is falfely attributed to the archbishop of Novgorod; it is certain, nevertheles, that the original manufcript was corrected by the hand of that prelate, and that he noted in the margin the new inquiries he intended to make.

Journal Petra Velikago. — Journal of Peter the Great, 2 vol. 4to. St. Petersburg, 1770. — If that prince did not himfelf write this journal, he at least caused it to be written under his own inspection, and corrected it with his own han 1 in a great number of places. It was given to the public by prince Schtscherbatof, who has added to it some papers of importance taken from the archives.

Opiffanie Sibirfkago Tzarstva. — Defeription of the kingdom of Siberia, 1 vol. 4to. St. Petersburg, 1750. — The learned work of M. Muller, corroborated by a great variety of original documents.

Sibirfkuïa Istoriya. — Hillory of Siberia, by M. Fifcher, profeffor of the academy of fciences at St. Petersburg, 1 vol. 4to. St. Petersburg, 1774. — The author has made con-112 fiderable fiderable use of M. Muller's work, to which he has added many learned and curious remarks of his own.

Opiffanie Zemli Kamtfkatki. — Defeription of Kamtfhatka, by Kracheninnikof, 2 vols. 4to. St. Peterfburg, 1755. — The author, being fent to Kamtfhatka by the academy of feiences, composed his work from his own obfervations, and those of Steller, member of that academy, and died at Tiumen, in 1745, on his return from his literary travels.

Drewniaia Roffijkaia ifloriya Lomonofova. — Aucient hiftory of Ruffia, by Lomonofof, 1 vol. 4to. St. Peterfburg, 1766. — The author was the beft poet of his country, and at the fame time an excellent profe-writer: but he was defitute of that critical judgment which is the chief quality of an hiftorian.

Téjéméfiatebniya Sotchiueniya, 20 vols. 8vo. — This is a journal publifhed monthly by the imperial academy of feiences at St. Peterfburg, from 1755 to 1765. It contains a great number of very important hiftorical pieces, the greater part composed by the learned M. Muller, well known for his indefatigable refearches into ruffian hiftory.

Drevniaia Roffijkaia Vivliophika. — Ancient ruffian library, 10 vols. 8vo. — A collection of original authentic pieces, drawn from the cabinets and archives, and publifhed by M. Novikof. Among them are feveral articles of great importance.

Razfujdénié o voiné s Shvedfieiu. — Differtation on the war with Sweden, by baron Shafirof, vice-chancellor of the ruffian empire, 1 vel. 12mo. St. Peterfburg, 1722. — It is a manufcript written by order of Peter I. and under his infpection. It deferves to be confulted by all who. would fludy the hiftory of that prince.

Istoriya Rossiikaia Tschujestrantsom. — Hiftory of Russia, in manufeript. — The author is a foreigner who lived in the the reign of Peter I. The frequent gallicifms that occur in his rufs diction lead one to think that he was a Frenchman. He knew nothing of the ruffian chronicles, and has followed the livonian, fwedifh, and polifh hiftorians. He may be taxed with very frequent miftakes, and muft therefore be confulted with diftruft, though he is not without utility, efpecially as to the hiftory of tzar Ivan Vaffillievitch. That prince in the laft years of his life ftruck fuch terror into his fubjects, that the Ruffians no longer dared to commit anything the paper. Accordingly, for a period of feveral years, it is only from foreigners, who were at war with them, or who travelled among them, that anything is to be learnt of their hiftory.

Povjednevniya zapijki vremeni tzarei Mikhaïla Pheodorovitcha i Alexeiya Mikhaïlovitcha. — Journals of the courfe of times of the tzars Mikhaïla Pheodorovitch and Alexey Mikhaïlovitch, 2 vols. 4to. Mofco, 1769. — Thefe memoirs inform us on what days the fovereigns dined in ftate, what officers of the court waited at table, in what manner foreign ambaffadors were received, what officers were fent to meet them, &c. But they likewife prefent us with fome hiftorical facts, which are of the moft confummate authenticity.

Rodoflovi imperatorfkoi familii. — Genealogy of the imperial houfe. — This manufcript, the work of fome literary man, ought to be confulted as containing fome historical facts.

Rerum Moscowitarum commentarii Sigifmundi liberi baronis in Herberstain. Basilea, 1571, 1 vol. folio. — Commentary of baron Herberstain, on Russia. — The author was twice fent on embassies to Russia, first by the emperor Maximilian, and asterwards by the emperor Ferdinand. He took much pains to acquire information, and he imparts it liberally to his readers. It may be here remarked, that feveral of the works written in latin concerning Ruffia, in the fisteenth century, are far fuperior to anything that has fince appeared from foreigners touching that empire.

Mofeovia deferiptio, auctore Alexandro Guagnino Veronenfi. - Defeription of Ruffia, by Alexander Guagnini, of Verona. - This author enters at large into the cruelties of tzar Ivan Vassilievitch. He appears to have been well acquainted with the chronicle of prince Kurbskoy, and that he has translated entire fections from it. Guagnini had a command at Vitepik, a place then belonging to Boland, and bordering on Ruffia. Here he might have an opportunity for learning many particulars from the Ruffians who fled into Poland to avoid the cruelties of their fovereign, and it is not unlikely that he was in connection with prince Kurbikoy.

Joannis Basilidis, magni Moschovia ducis, vita, a Paulo Oderbornio, tribus libris, conferipta. - Life of Ivan Vaffillievitch, by Paul Oderborn. - It is rather a violent declamation against the tzar, than a history of that prince. Great confusion prevails in this work; and that defect is not compenfated by the accuracy of the transactions.

Historia belli Livonici; quod magnus Moschovitarum dux contrà Livones geffit, per Tilmannum Bredenbachium conferipta. - Hiftory of the war of the grand-duke of Molcovy againft the Livoniaus. - A work written under the dictation of a priest. It is accurate in regard to the principal facts.

These three works, that of Herberstain and some others, are comprized in a collection, entitled, Rerum Moschoviticarum scriptores varii, Frankofurti, 1700. folio.

Antonii Poff. vini Moschovia. - Moscovy, by pere Posse. vin, 1 vol. folio, 1587. - This jefuit was fent on an embaffy in 1531, to tzar Ivan Vaffillievitch, by pope Gregory XIII. His teftimony is of great weight as to the object of

of his negotiation, and he may be trufted in his relation of the cuftoms and transactions to which he was witness.

État de Pempire de Russie et grand duché de Moscovie, par le capitaine Margaret. Paris, 1669. The author, after having ferved in France, where he was born, was captain of a company of guards formed by tzar Dmitry, commonly called the first false Demetrius. He was intimately acquainted with that impostor, or that prince, and deferves to be confulted.

Iter in Moschoviam, &c. — Travels into Moscovy, by baron Mayerberg. folio. — The author was ambaffador from the emperor to tzar Alexey Mikhaïlovitch; and is worthy of confidence in what he relates as having feen.

Travels in Tartary, Moscovy, and Persia, by Adam Olearius : jolio. 1728. — The author communicates a small number of facts, with descriptions, curious enough, of several customs.

Genealogical hiflory of the Tartars, by the khan Abulgafi Baatur. — The antient relations between the Ruffians and the Tartars, render this work of importance to the hiftory of Ruffia.

Diarium itineris in Moscoviam dom. de Guariens et Rall, àb imperatore Leopoldo I. ad tzarum Petrum Alexiovicium ablegati extraordiuarii, descriptum a Joanne Georgio Korb, secretario ablegationis Casuria. Vienna austria, folio. — This work is extremely rare, and fells at a high price. It was written by John George Korb, secretary to the embassify from the emperor Leopold I. to Peter I. in 1698, and contains the particulars of the punishments and tortures to which the revolted firelits were condemned. As the tzar, on this occasion, wreaked his vengeance by the most horrid cruelties, it is faid, that the court of Vienna suppressed all the copies of this book, except a few that had already got abroad.

Memoires

SOURCES OF

Memoires pour fervir à l'histoire de l'empire russien, fous Pierre le grand, par un ministre étranger, résident en cette cour. La Haye, 1725. 2 vols. 12mo. — The author of this work is not mentioned; but it is certain that he visited and followed the court of Russia from 1714 to 1719. He speaks the truth, and most of the facts he relates were still recollected by perfons alive, not many years ago. Whether he were in reality a minister from some foreign power, or whether that quality was falsely attributed to him by his editor, is uncertain. The same work appeared under the following title, Nouveaux memoires fur l'état préfent de la grandé Russie ou Moscovie, par un Allemand résident en cette cour. Paris, 1725, 2 vols. 12mo. Which of the two editions is the original is not known.

Hiflorical account of the ruffian empire, by baron Strahlenberg, 1 vol. 4to. — The author was one of the fwedith officers taken prifoners by the Ruffians, and fent into Siberia. He certainly had opportunities for obfervation and inquiry; yet his work is inferior to his reputation, and may frequently miflead the reader.

Hiftoire de l'empire de Ruffie fous Pierre le grand, par Voltaire. — If this famous author had been better furnifhed with materials, by thofe who engaged to do fo, from his lively and pleafing manner of writing there is no doubt that his work would have been a mafterly performance; whereas it feems to be entirely composed from mutilated and injudicious extracts from the journal of Peter the Great. It is manifest that, from the commencement of the war with Sweden, he was even left in ignorance of the circumstances of the battle of Narva, which at once diminished the glory of the victors, and the difgrace of the vanquished. A German, employed in the affairs of the cabinet, was commisfioned to supply Voltaire with the necessary documents; but, but, either becaufe he thought himfelf flighted by the hiftorian, or becaufe he was in the intention of writing a hiftory of the fame prince, he neglected his duty. The work of Voltaire affords but a finall number of facts that reft on fubflantial authorities; and he was, perhaps, confcious of the defects of his book, when he faid: "I would have engraved " on my tomb, Here lies the man who attempted to com-" pofe the hiftory of Peter the Great."

Hifloire des révolutions de Perfe, depuis le commeucement de ce fiecle. Paris, 1750, 3 vols. 12mo. — The author adduces all the pieces which he procured at Conftantinople for the composition of his work, and highly merits the confidence of his readers.

Memoires de Gatharine I. 1 vol. 12mo. La Haye, 1728. --This volume, containing very few facts, is fwelled with tranflations of flate papers.

Effai fur la bibliotheque et le cabinet d'histoire-naturelle de l'académie des sciences de S. Petersbourg, par Jean Bacmeisser. S. Petersb. 1776. 1 vol. 8vo. — The author introduces some historical facts into his work.

The Antidote; or an inquiry into the merits of the abbé d'Auteroche's book, translated from the french. London, 1772. — In a bitter invective against a writer of great levity, this book contains fome curious and authentic advertifements on the history, the products, the commerce, and the government of Russia. The original, here badly translated, is supposed to be the production of feveral authors, all well informed, and having more or less share in the administration. I have been told that it was the joint performance of the late empress Catharine II. and count Peter Schuvalof.

Historical, political, and military memoirs concerning Ruffia, by general Manstein. London, 4to. — The author, who was general aid-de-camp to field-marshal Munich, was witness to the facts he relates, and was even employed in circumstances of a delicate nature. He is of fervice in regard to the reigns of Peter II. the empress Anne, the young Ivan, and the first years of Elizabeth. The english translation is extremely inaccurate; leading the reader into numberless mistakes, particularly in regard to distances, the word mile being uniformly retained from the german, which denotes a measure nearly fix times as large as the mere english reader would be led hence to suppose.

Effai fur le commerce de Russie. Amsterdam, (Paris,) 1777-This fuperior work is by M. Marbault, formerly fecretary to the envoy from France to Russia. The publication was furely not executed under his infpection, as fuch mistakes are committed in the names of perfons, tribes, and places, that they are fearcely to be known.

History of the northern governments, by Mr. Williams, 2 vols. 4to. The part devoted to the history of Russian contains fome truths no remarkable observations, a great number of errors, and above all a decided partiality against the Russians. If the Russians are beaten, the author is fure that they deferved it; if they are conquerors, he shows that they had no right to be fo. But, after having copiously exaggerated the defects of their government, and their ignorance in the art of war, and in naval affairs, he pronounces, that they are able to cope with all the powers of Europe, except the English.

Journal von Rufsland, by J. H. Buffe, 1793, &c. - A monthly publication, containing a great variety of ufeful materials for the hiftory and geography of Ruffia.

Istoritschefkoye i topografitschefkoye opissanize gorodof. Moskofskoi guberniis ich ujefdami. — Historical and topographical defeription of the towns of the moscovian governmentand their circles. Mosco, 1788. — This government being one of the most important in the empire, and the accounts of it hitherto published being extremely defective, the work here mentioned may be reckoned among the most interesting contributions to the topography of Russia. The defeription of the capital is indeed only a dry register of facts, affording little entertainment in the perusal, but the data there collected render it highly welcome to geographers by profession, as enabling them to rectify many omissions and missakes that have flipt into the deferiptions of Busching, and other writers.

. Primetschaniya na istoriyu drewniya i nuneschniya Rossi gospod. Leklerka. - Remarks on the antient and modern hiftory of Ruffia by M. le Clerc, by major general Ivan Boltin. St. Peterfb. 1788. - The great reputation which the author of this work has obtained by it in his own country, has even excited the curiofity of foreigners, feveral of whom have publicly expressed their withes, that fome, at least, of the more important chapters of it were conveyed into another language. The extracts that appear in these volumes of ruffian hiftory, contain the most interesting remarks of that author, (to the regret of all true antiquaries now no more) on numerous and very different fubjects of the hiftory, the politics, the religion, the manners and ufages of his country, in which all the polemical attacks upon the french hiftorian, are either entirely omitted, or fo far fuppreffed, as to fland in no effential connection with the paffages to which they were intended to relate. The difficulties attending this felection, and the pains which it coft the translator to compress the greater part of fo voluminous a work into these occasional abstracts, though an unapparent merit, is yet very hard of attainment, which can only be appreciated by fuch as have put their patience and their diligence to a fimilar trial.
